Resolved, etc., That for the further relief of sufferers from earthquake and conflagration on the Pacific coast, as provided in the joint resolution approved April 19, 1906, as amended by the joint resolution approved April 20, 1906, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000,000 or so much thereof as may be necessary; and authority is hereby specifically given to the Secretary of War to use this sum and the former appropriation for this purpose, amounting in all to $2,000,000, not only to buy additional supplies which may be needed for the relief of the sufferers as directed in said resolutions of April 19 and April 20, but also for the purpose of replacing by purchase such subsistence, quartermaster's, and medical supplies which may have been furnished by the Secretary of War for such relief from the stores on hand for the use of the Army.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield to me a moment, I wish to say that this legislation is of such exceptional and emergency character that it ought to override all preformed conclusions. For that reason I shall not object to unanimous consent for its consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit and have read, in connection with the resolution, a copy of a letter from the Secretary of War to the President, showing what was done by him in reference to the calamity in California before any action was taken by Congress, and why it is necessary to authorize the expenditure of part of this money for the purchase of supplies, including commissary and medical supplies, so that he can replace those which have already been sent forward to San Francisco. In submitting this copy of the Secretary's letter to the President, I should state to the House that I do so not at the request or upon authority of the Secretary, but upon my own motion, believing that will convey more accurately than I can the necessity for this additional appropriation and the object it is intended to accomplish. I should also state that the Secretary informed me that, while he suggested an additional appropriation of one million, he was advised that the President would recommend a million and a half additional. But, Mr. Speaker, I thought that, inasmuch as the House desires to conclude the consideration of the District appropriation bill, and for that purpose wanted to go into the Committee of the Whole, I would offer this resolution now, and when we receive the recommendation of the President we can then take such action and make such additional appropriation as the House may deem necessary.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 21, 1906.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The situation at San Francisco is such as to require an additional appropriation from Congress to meet the necessities of the people of that stricken city who are immediately in need of shelter and food. The War Department has rendered all the assistance possible, beginning its orders as soon as the first telegram was received from General Funston, about midnight of the 18th instant. Indeed, a telegram was sent by Assistant Secretary Oliver to General Funston immediately upon the receipt of the news of the earthquake, on the morning of the 18th, directing him to render all assistance possible. From the night of the 18th of April all the available stores of the Army, of three departments, have been used for relief purposes, assuming that the action of this Department would be ratified by Congress, in acordance with precedents in similar cases.

The memorandum of the General Staff, which accompanies this letter, shows the telegrams received from General Funston, which gradually developed the extent of the terrible disaster and increased the amount of supplies of every kind needed.

All subsistence and quartermaster supplies and all medical stores of every kind which were in the military depots in San Francisco were destroyed, except the local supplies for the troops stationed at the post at the Presidio, at San Francisco. Accordingly, everything had to be ordered from a distance. There are now on the way by special express trains from every available and convenient point where they were stored 900,000 rations, which means the rations for 900,000 soldiers for one day. The value of these rations is estimated by the Commissary-General to be $198,000. Two hundred thousand of these rations have probably reached San Francisco this morning, in charge of commissary officers.

The Quartermaster's Department has expressed by special train wall tents, conical tents, hospital tents, and storage tents for the shelter of 100,000 people; 100,000 blankets, 7,500 mattresses, 15,000 bed sacks, and 8,000 cots, part of which have already reached San Francisco from the immediate vicinity, and all of which are hastening to the city by special trains, which have been given precedence over passenger trains.

The quartermaster supplies already delivered in San Francisco, or en route by special express trains in charge of competent military quartermasters, amount in value to $1,031,734.40.

The medical bureau of this Department has sent five carloads of medical supplies from St. Louis by express, in charge of competent medical officers and hospital stewards. The estimated value of these medical supplies is $50,000.

It is estimated that the cost of transportation for all these supplies amounts to $150,000, so that the cost of that which has already been done in the matter of relief for San Francisco is $1,429,734.40.

On the 19th Congress passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to procure, in open market or otherwise, subsistence and quartermaster's supplies, in addition to such supplies belonging to the military establishment and available, and issue the same to such destitute persons who have been rendered homeless or are in needy circumstances as a result of the earthquake which occurred April 18, and the pending conflagration, and in executing this joint resolution the Secretary of War is directed to cooperate with the authorities of the State of California and the mayors of the cities in San Francisco, Berkeley, Oakland,

Alameda, and such other cities on the Pacific coast as may have sustained damage.

"Be it further resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Navy, and Secretary of Commerce and Labor are hereby directed to cooperate with the Secretary of War in extending relief and assistance to these stricken people herein referred to, to the extent of the use of the naval vessels, revenue cutters, and other vessels and Government supplies under their control on the Pacific coast.

"Be it further resolved, That to enable the Secretary of War to execute the provisions of this joint resolution there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000,000, to be expended under the direction and under the discretion of the Secretary of War."

On the 20th, at my suggestion, the resolution was amended so as to include medical supplies, as follows:

"Resolved, That the appropriation of $1,000,000 made by joint resolution approved the 19th instant, entitled 'Joint resolution for the relief of sufferers from earthquake and conflagration on the Pacific coast,' shall be available, under the discretion of the Secretary of War, to procure medical supplies, in addition to such supplies belonging to the military establishment, and issue the same in like manner as the subsistence and quartermaster's supplies specifically mentioned in the joint resolution aforesaid."

I have the honor to recommend that Congress be requested to appropriate $1,000,000 more, in order to meet the cost already incurred over and above the $1,000,000 appropriated, and to enable the War Department to purchase such additional supplies as may be needed for the purpose.

The present resolution authorizes the expenditure of money for the relief of San Francisco. The supplies which have been sent have been taken out of the regular Army depots, and were necessary for the support and use of the Army. I respectfully suggest therefore that in the next resolution, which I hope Congress may pass, specific authority be given to the Secretary of War to use both the $1,000,000 already appropriated and the amount which may be appropriated in the recommended resolution, either to purchase supplies for the relief of San Francisco or to replace by purchase the supplies taken from the regular Army stores for such relief purposes.

I inclose the form of resolution which will accomplish the result sought.

I attach the memorandum of the Chief of Staff, the report of the Quartermaster-General, and the report of the Commissary-General, with their accompanying telegrams and estimates. I also attach a memorandum from the Surgeon-General as to his operations and needs.

The loss of the valuable subsistence, quartermaster's, and medical stores assembled in the depot at San Francisco for use at the Pacific posts and in the Philippines will require a very considerable deficiency estimate in order that they, in addition to the stores now being used for the relief of San Francisco, may be replaced.

The loss may be approximated as follows:

Commissary stores	$150,000
Quartermaster's stores	2,941,472
Medical stores	357,391
Total	3,448,863

I shall submit estimate for these at a later date.

Very respectfully, yours,

WM. H. TAFT, Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield to me?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama five minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of this resolution. I think that the American people will thoroughly approve of the action of Congress in making this appropriation and the one that was made the other day. But in making the appropriation I think Congress, even in case of an emergency of this kind, should look to its duty and protect the money of the people. Now, I have the very highest regard and admiration for the gentleman who is Secretary of War. I believe thoroughly in his honesty and integrity, but I do believe that when the Congress of the United States makes an appropriation of a large sum of money, not only for our protection but for the protection of the people for whom we have made the appropriation, we should see that it is properly expended for their benefit. Under these circumstances, this being an emergency resolution, I would not offer, and I do not think it would be proper that it should come from this side of the House or from that side of the House, to interfere with the gentleman from Minnesota by offering an amendment to an emergency resolution of this kind. I appeal to him to do this; here are $2,000,000 that we appropriate for a specific purpose to help these suffering people. I think this resolution should clearly carry a provision that after it is expended the Secretary of War should report to the Congress what has been done with that money and how it has been expended. I think that is not only in the interest of good government, but I think it is in the interest of the people for whom we are making the appropriation, in order that it may be safeguarded and see that it goes to them and no one else. I do not offer an amendment, but I offer the suggestion to the gentleman from Minnesota in charge of the bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, all of the money that has been appropriated or will be appropriated by this resolution, except $500,000, has already been expended in this way. The Secretary of War immediately on receiving the news of this terrible disaster, ordered supplies, quartermaster's stores, and medical supplies shipped to San Francisco. The aggregate value shown by the statement which has been submitted—the aggregate value of the supplies already taken out of the Government storehouses—amounts to about $1,492,000.

This appropriation is for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of War to replace those supplies which have been thus taken from the storehouses and warehouses under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War. The purchases authorized by the resolution will have to be made in accordance with the provisions of law governing such purchases. In other words, about $1,492,000 is necessary to replace the supplies that have already been shipped from Government storehouses, and these supplies will have to be purchased under the same conditions, under the same law that the original supplies were purchased.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I grant the gentleman all that.

Mr. TAWNEY. So that the Government is amply protected, and the report will have to be made of these purchases under the law as is required in other cases.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not understand the law that way. This is a specific appropriation for an emergency, and, as I understand it, there is no law that would require the Secretary of War to report the expenditure of this money back to Congress.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say this: He is aware of the fact that the supplies which the Secretary of War has already shipped to San Francisco were purchased by appropriations made in the general appropriation for that purpose. Now, this resolution authorizes the Secretary of War to use so much of this million dollars as is carried by this resolution, and all of the appropriation carried by the previous resolution adopted by Congress in the purchase of supplies, under existing law, to replace those which have been taken out. So it leaves a little over $500,000 which the Secretary of War would be able to authorize to use for the relief of these people, and a report of that expenditure will unquestionably be carried in the annual report of the Secretary.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Minnesota does not understand my proposition.

Mr. TAWNEY. I am afraid that the gentleman from Alabama has not comprehended my statement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that a great deal of the supplies that have been purchased and are to be shipped for the relief of these people are already the property of the Government and that new supplies are to be purchased in place of them, and we want to know where the supplies are sent, who gets the benefit of them, how they are distributed, who is responsible for the distribution; and that report should be made to Congress, not only in the matter of honest administration of the Government, but as a matter of protection to the people for whom the money is being spent.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that that is at all practical or necessary. The people of the United States, who are to-day contributing millions of dollars for the relief of the people of San Francisco and neighboring cities, are not exacting an itemized statement from the people of San Francisco to show the persons to whom they are giving relief and I do not think the Government of the United States should do it.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] if it is not a fact that every dollar of this expenditure will be audited by the Auditor and a report made to him as to the entire expenditure, and every dollar of it will pass through the same ordeal as every dollar of the hundreds of millions that we appropriate to be expended by the Departments from year to year?

Mr. TAWNEY. It will, unquestionably.

Mr. PAYNE. So there is no occasion to make this a special case in that respect.

Mr. TAWNEY. And I want to say further that the Secretary of War informed the committee this morning that not a dollar of this money will be given to anyone to expend except the bonded officials of the Government of the United States who are engaged in the distribution of the quartermaster's stores and supplies under the control of the Army.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, one of the points, and I think the main point, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] makes is this: No one objects to the appropriation—no one could do it under the circumstances—but it is to see that the money that we appropriate is actually used and certainly used to help the people that need the help. In other words, that no middleman gets in and gets the benefit of the money and that the victim of the earthquake gets it. That is the point he makes.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] had listened to my statement to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I listened, and I am always glad to listen to the gentleman.

Mr. TAWNEY. He would know that $1,500,000 worth of supplies, the property of the Government, has already been shipped and is now on the way to San Francisco.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No one disputes that.

Mr. TAWNEY. And $1,500,000 of the $2,000,000 which we will have appropriated by this resolution will be used in the purchase of supplies for the Army to take the place of those supplies which the Army has thus shipped.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I fully understand that.

Mr. TAWNEY. Those purchases must be made under existing law by advertising.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understand that.

Mr. TAWNEY. And there is no question about the expenditure of the money at all.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who is going to see that the victims get the benefit of this money? That is the point of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. TAWNEY. The men in charge of distributing supplies of the Quartermaster's Department, under the command of the Army officers in charge or in command at San Francisco, will have to distribute these supplies, and we are informed by the Secretary of War that his organization there is amply sufficient for the distribution of these supplies to the people who are in need of them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just a moment more and then I am done. Is there a law now requiring that officer who distributes on the ground floor this food and raiment to make a report to the Secretary of War or Congress?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly. The Secretary of War will require a complete detailed report.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] that it was impossible to hear all that was said over here, but I think, so far as I could catch his reply, he was undertaking to explain to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and to the House that all of the details of the expenditure of this appropriation will be made in the usual way by the bureau chiefs under whom it will be expended. Am I correct?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And that this is merely an emergency appropriation to supply a deficiency which will be created in the Quartermaster's Department and the Medical Department, and so on, and that we will have the usual military reports from the bureau chiefs, itemized in every particular.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; and audited by the Auditor of the War Department.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The question was taken; and the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TAWNEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18198—the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the District appropriation bill, with Mr. DALZELL in the chair.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I want to say before the Clerk begins the reading of the bill I want to offer a formal amendment to have a letter read.

Mr. KEIFER. I would yield to the gentleman for a request, but not for the purpose of reading. I want to call attention, Mr. Chairman, to the inadvertent action, as I understand it, of the House last evening in the matter of messengers for the six courts of the District of Columbia. I am not certain whether it is subject to a motion to amend or not, but it is proposed to amend a part of the paragraph under the head of "Court-houses, District of Columbia," so as to provide for seven messengers instead of three. What I wish to say is that when this matter was under discussion yesterday there was a wrong impression created in the House and acceded to by all around, growing out of a statement made by gentlemen who apparently knew, that the judges of these courts, each of them, had three bailiffs and one crier. I understand that the gentlemen who made that statement on yesterday have been advised that they were entirely mistaken about it and that the courts in this District, none of them, have a bailiff or a crier, or have in the past had either, and I therefore ask unanimous consent to go back and have that matter reviewed as to that proposition so that these judges may have the messengers who are absolutely essential to the conduct of the court. I wish to say also in that connection that the messengers they have had hitherto have acted as criers; that they take charge of juries, and that there are no bailiffs at all and never have been in these courts. There is a section of the code (188 as I now recollect) that provides for bailiffs, but none were ever appropriated for, as I understand it, and none were ever appointed and there are none now and there will be none unless we appropriate for them.

If we appropriate for one messenger for one court, he will serve the court and take charge of the jury and do the errands of the attorneys trying cases and all the other necessary things to be done. I understand, and I think it will not now be disputed, that we acted entirely under the impression, both in the Committee on Appropriations and in this House, that they had criers when we cut the messengers down to three—three having to serve six courts in different rooms, all divided, and some of the court rooms are on different floors, making it absolutely impossible for three messengers to perform the duties that are usually required and necessary for the conduct of the courts.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I wish to make a very brief statement in reply to the gentleman from Ohio. In the sundry civil bill a year ago, appropriating for the ensuing fiscal year, there is a provision to defray the expenses of the supreme court of the District and circuit courts of the United States, including the district court of the Territory of Hawaii and the supreme court and court of appeals of the District of Columbia, and other courts, and among the things appropriated for these various courts I find the following:

> For pay of bailiffs and criers, not exceeding three bailiffs and one crier in each court, except in the southern district of New York.

In the sundry civil bill as brought into the House last year the Committee on Appropriations had inserted a provision that the expense of the supreme court of the District of Columbia and court of appeals, and for all the expenses, "including pay of bailiffs and criers," should be borne, half by the District of Columbia and half by the Federal Government. That provision went out on a point of order, so that the expenses are still provided by the Federal Government. In the legislative bill just passed the House there is a provision for six stenographers—one for the chief justice and one for each justice of the supreme court. There is authority of law, and appropriation has been made for three bailiffs and one crier in these courts, and if they have not got them it is no fault of this House or of Congress, and for that reason——

Mr. KEIFER. I want to ask the gentleman whether he pretends to say now—I understand his excuse for the statement of yesterday—that any of the courts of the District of Columbia ever had a bailiff?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I say now that Congress has specifically appropriated for three bailiffs and one crier for each court in the District.

Mr. KEIFER. In that the gentleman is mistaken, but it was sufficient excuse for his statement of yesterday.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the first word; I can not move to strike out the last word.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to go back——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I object to the request of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KEIFER. I think the gentleman ought not to do that, in view of what he put in the RECORD yesterday, and I know on the best authority, which I ask him to see, that there were no bailiffs in past years and there are none now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If I may have permission to say so——

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman did say it yesterday.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If I may have permission, I wish to make one statement to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman states that I made an erroneous statement. I repeat again for the benefit of the gentleman, who does not seem to be able to appreciate the force of the statement, that I have here the sundry civil appropriation bill for the present fiscal year, in which there is a provision for not exceeding three bailiffs and one crier in each of these courts.

Mr. KEIFER. That was not your statement of yesterday.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman stated yesterday that each one of these judges has a private stenographer besides the one that reported the court proceedings. Does the sundry civil bill say that also?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No, it does not. Until this year these private stenographers were paid out of the appropriation for miscellaneous expenses. This year in the legislative appropriation bill, which has already passed the House, provision is made for these six stenographers, one for the chief justice, and one for each other justice, at $900 each.

Mr. NORRIS. Are these in addition to the regular court reporters?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are private secretaries. They are private secretaries to the judges.

Mr. NORRIS. But do these reporters report the court proceedings?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are private secretaries.

Mr. KEIFER. I have the authority of the judges themselves that these stenographers do all the reporting and that there is no other reporter.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman's information is so much at variance with mine that we evidently will not be able to agree. I object to his request.

Mr. KEIFER. I asked the gentleman to go and talk with the judges about it, but he would not do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] objects to the request for unanimous consent made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

The Clerk will read.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the first word. I can not strike out the last word, because that is a part of an amendment that has been agreed to. Now, Mr. Chairman, in order to bear out the contention which I made yesterday afternoon, and which is made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] this morning, I wish to take this opportunity to put in the RECORD a letter which I have received from one of the judges, and I want to say that the letter was received in response to a request for information made by myself. The judges have not been hanging around this building; they have not been having these attendants running around as if they were "pets," as some gentleman was gracious enough to say yesterday afternoon; but the information was given to me, as shown by the letter, in response to a request which I made on my own volition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the letter.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Did not we pass upon this section yesterday?

Mr. MUDD. We did not finish it.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Is there a motion to set aside what we did on yesterday?

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent to set aside our action of yesterday was refused. The gentleman from Maryland is now speaking to an informal amendment. The letter will be read in the gentleman's time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is the matter that the gentleman from Maryland desires to put into the RECORD relative to the matter about which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] asked unanimous consent?

Mr. MUDD. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is speaking to an amendment to strike out the first word, and he asked to have the letter read by the Clerk in his time as part of his remarks. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SUPREME COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, JUSTICE'S CHAMBERS,
April 20, 1906.

Hon. S. E. MUDD,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SYDNEY: Referring to your inquiry in regard to the "assistant messengers," as they are designated in the appropriation bill, I have to say that these employees are improperly described in said bill. They are "messengers for each court in special term" and are so described by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1901, known as the "Code of the District." By this act the court is authorized to appoint a messenger for each court. There are six courts—two equity, two criminal, and two law—sitting separately all the time excepting during the summer vacation, when the several judges take turns in holding the several special terms. These messengers have been provided by Congress for more than twenty-four years, one for each separate court. To those of us who are familiar with the descriptions of court officers in the several States, they would be more properly called "bailiffs," as there are no bailiffs provided by law for the court and these men discharge such duties as are performed by bailiffs, in addition to numerous other duties. For example, they clean and care for the rooms of the individual judges; go to the law library for books for use in court; run errands during trials for the judges and counsel; attend to the ventilation of the court-rooms; put water in the coolers; assist in preserving order in the court, and get the lunches for the respective judges at noon, the recess taken being too short to enable us to leave the building. In short, they are busy from the time court convenes until it adjourns with the numberless duties which the conduct of litigated cases imposes.

If the committee would take the pains to investigate, it would find, I am satisfied, that the courts of this District have a much smaller number of court officials than the courts of any other city in the country. To take away these court messengers, who receive the small salary of $60 per month, half of which is paid by the District, would be to sacrifice the convenience of litigants, lawyers, and judges. To reduce the number from seven to three would be equally unreasonable, as there are six courts in continuous session and each requires a messenger. The seventh is for the use of the marshal's office, and surely no one familiar with the business there transacted could question the necessity of a man for that office.

You may use this letter as you please.

Very sincerely,
ASHLEY M. GOULD.

Mr. MUDD. Now, Mr. Chairman, just one word. It occurs to me possibly there may have been some mistake in this matter, arising out of the fact that the District courts are not only United States courts, but perform the functions of the ordinary common-law courts. Possibly somebody has made a construction under which the provision of the sundry civil bill that has been referred to may have not been applied to the salaries of these bailiffs. At any rate, the bailiffs have never been provided. In addition to the information contained in the letter which has been read, the chief judge of the supreme court, Justice Clabaugh, has informed me that they never had bailiffs, and certainly they could not have had them, or he and his associate, Justice Gould, would not have so stated.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, what are the vocations of these officers that are standing around in the District courts and performing the duties of bailiff? What are they called?

Mr. MUDD. That letter states that these are messengers, and are known as such, but they act as bailiffs, and that letter states the absolute fact.

Mr. PALMER. There are three or four officers standing around doing the duty of bailiffs; I do not know what they are called, but they are there, for I have seen them there myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. MUDD. I ask two minutes more.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I object to any further discussion.

Mr. MUDD. I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that on yesterday, by order of the committee, all debate on this paragraph and amendments was closed.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I desire to offer an amendment, Mr. Chairman, to the paragraph. I understand the paragraph under the title of "Court-house, District of Columbia," is the one that was read last. I move to insert after the word "each," on line 18, page 65, this language:

And six messengers, at $720 each.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "each," line 18, page 65, insert "and six messengers, at $720 each."

Mr. FITZGERALD. I raise the point of order against that amendment. The committee has already passed upon that question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order. Debate has been ordered closed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. An amendment was offered to insert three messengers. An amendment to that was offered substituting seven for three. The committee defeated the amendment to the amendment, and adopted the original amendment. Now, if the gentleman wished to amend the original amendment, his amendment should have been offered before the vote was taken upon the original amendment. The committee having inserted as a new provision, after attempt at amendment, a provision for three messengers, it is too late for the gentleman to offer his amendment. An amendment was offered and pending, to which an amendment was offered. That amendment to the amendment was defeated. The gentleman then had his opportunity to offer further amendment; but not claiming that right, the committee proceeded to adopt the original amendment, and I submit it is too late now to offer it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York understands that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana is not an amendment to the amendment which was adopted, but is an independent amendment to the text.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the further point that they are not authorized by law. The bill now has a provision for three messengers.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I desire to correct my amendment and insert the word "four" instead of the word "six;" so as to read "four messengers, at $720 each."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be corrected.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "each" insert "and four messengers."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, this amendment is an independent, substantive amendment. It may not, if it shall be adopted, be the best grammar or rhetoric, but the paragraph now stands providing for three messengers, at $720 each. I propose a new and independent amendment, after the word "each," in line 18, to provide for four messengers, at $720 each, so the paragraph will read, if this amendment shall be adopted, "four messengers, $720 each; three messengers, $720 each." It is not an amendment to an amendment. I do not see why that would not be good legislation, though it should be rather poor grammatical arrangement. I think the point of order made by the gentleman from New York is not well taken, and it seems to me that the amendment is in order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman can not do by indirection what he can not do directly, and the effect of the attempt to amend the provision regarding messengers was determined yesterday by the committee. The gentleman had his opportunity at the proper time to offer an amendment to the original amendment to incorporate into the bill the provision for messengers. He has lost the right by not taking advantage of his right at the proper time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana is an independent amendment. Whether it makes consistent text or grammatical text or anything else is not a question of order that the Chair can determine, but is a question of good sense, to be determined by the committee itself. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts) there were—ayes 42, noes 66.

So the amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to return to the House of Representatives, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 1975) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Dugger.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

S. 4925. An act to amend the act approved March 6, 1896, relating to the anchorage and movements of vessels in St. Marys River;

S. 1308. An act granting an increase of pension to Emilie Grace Reich; and

S. 1248. An act granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Bean.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5639. An act to provide for the erection of a public building at San Juan, Porto Rico;

S. 4774. An act relating to the movement and anchorage of vessels in Hampton Roads, the harbors of Norfolk and Newport News, and adjacent waters, in the State of Virginia;

S. 3139. An act for the relief of Lorenzo A. Bailey; and

S. 1274. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building at Washington, N. C.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Board of charities: For secretary, $3,000; clerk, $1,200; stenographer, $1,080; messenger, $600; one inspector, $900; six inspectors, at $720 each; four drivers, at $600 each; hostler, $540; traveling expenses, $200; in all, $13,340.

Provided, That from and after July 1, 1906, all appropriations under the general head of "Charities and corrections," any portion of which is payable from the revenues of the District of Columbia, for medical charities, for child-caring institutions, for temporary homes, and for other institutions of like character, shall be expended under the direction of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and shall be disbursed by the disbursing officer of the District of Columbia upon itemized vouchers duly audited and approved by the auditor of said District, in the manner now prescribed by law: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall in any way affect or alter the method of settlement and payment now existing between the District of Columbia and the Treasury Department of the United States for reimbursing appropriations payable wholly from the revenues of the United States for expenditures on account of the care, support, maintenance, and education of patients, inmates, and pupils belonging to the District of Columbia at the Government Hospital for the Insane, the Freedmen's Hospital and Asylum, the Reform School, District of Columbia, and the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, which expenditures are chargeable to District of Columbia appropriations.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against so much of the paragraph as begins on line 15, page 66, and ending at line 12, page 67, on the ground that it is confessedly new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. It is clearly new legislation.

The Clerk read as follows:

REFORMATORIES AND CORRECTIONAL INSTITUTIONS.

For Washington Asylum: For superintendent, $1,500; visiting physician, $1,080; resident physician, $480; clerk, $840; property clerk, $840; baker, $600; principal overseer, $1,200; fifteen overseers, at $600 each; engineer, $600; assistant engineer, $480; second assistant engineer, $360; engineer at hospital for seven and one-half months, at $50 per month; engineer at new workhouse for seven and one-half months, at $50 per month; two watchmen, at $480 each; two night watchmen, at $548 each; blacksmith and woodworker, $500; carpenter, $500; driver for dead wagon, $365; hostler and driver, $240; keeper at female workhouse, $300; keeper at female workhouse, $180; hospital cook, $600; chief cook for workhouse, $600; four assistant cooks, at $180 each; trained nurse, who shall act as superintendent of nursing, $600; two graduate nurses, at $365 each; graduate nurse for receiving ward, $365; two nurses for tuberculosis wards, at $365 each; six orderlies, at $300 each; pupil nurses, not less than twenty-one in number, $1,500; registered pharmacist, who shall act as hospital clerk, $720; gardener, $540; herdsman, $365; florist, $300; tailor, $120; temporary labor, not to exceed $3,000; in all, $34,561.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I see there is a provision in the bill for various appropriations for "a new workhouse," "keeper at female workhouse," and various references are made for the appropriation for "a workhouse." I would like to ask the gentleman what criminals are sentenced to the workhouse and what kind of work is required of them? From an examination of the Code of the District of Columbia, adopted by Congress, I see that the police court tries persons accused of petty offenses without a jury, and it has the right under the laws of the United States to sentence persons convicted in such courts to jail or workhouse. I see further, by section 1192 of the Code of the District of Columbia, that prisoners sentenced to imprisonment in the jail or the workhouse may be employed at such labor under such regulations as may be prescribed by the supreme court of the District.

I am not undertaking to attack the appropriations. I am seeking information, if I can get it, as to what criminals are sentenced to the workhouse and by what court, and what kind of work they do.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I understand that prisoners sent to the workhouse are sent from the police court here in the city of Washington. Many of them work outside, and the gentleman from Georgia has very likely seen them working on the streets.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is the information I am seeking. I was undertaking to get at it in an authoritative way. I understand that men—and women, too, I judge, for there is an appropriation made here for a female keeper at the workhouse—are sentenced to the workhouse by the police court in the city of Washington. They are sent there, among other things, for violating the ordinances of the city of Washington and petty police regulations. I understand that those criminals who are sentenced to a fine, or an alternative fine, are confined in the workhouse, and those who are sentenced to jail for a certain length of time may be sent to the workhouse, and from the workhouse or the jail may be required to work upon the roads or streets in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. That is the practice.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to state to the gentleman the reason of my inquiry. I have no attack to make on the appropriation, and no attack to make on that method or manner of punishment; but in the State where I live we have a similar provision, by reason of a statute of the State of Georgia. That system of punishment of criminals who violate city ordinances has been the subject of severe criticism and investigation at the hands of a member of the Federal judiciary. I wanted this information so that the country might know that those of us who live in Georgia, and whose laws are administered in the manner I have stated, are simply following the rule of punishment for violation of city ordinances that is prescribed by a law of Congress for the government of the capital of the country. I simply want the country to know that the city of Macon and other cities in Georgia prescribe a punishment similar to that provided for in the District of Columbia by the laws of Congress.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I would like two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to call attention to this, because I want the people of the country to know that in spite of the attack that has been made upon this system of punishment similar to the one that is inflicted here for the violation of city ordinances in the police court at Washington, the capital of the United States, such punishment is not an unusual one. It is one that is administered all over the country and by the police courts of most of the cities of the land. That was my purpose in seeking for the information, and I am glad that I have got it before the country, so that the people may know that in disposing of the criminals in cities for the section of the country where I live we do not violate the law of the land or the custom in administering the laws. We simply follow that well-known, well-established rule which exists in England, and has existed all over the land, in all the cities of the land, and these petty misdemeanors, violations of the city ordinances, are punished in Washington just like they are punished in Macon, Ga.

MESSAGE FROM PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CURRIER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. BARNES, one of his secretaries.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

MEDICAL CHARITIES.

To enable the board of charities to provide for care and treatment of, and free dispensary service to, indigent patients, under contracts or agreements to be made with hospitals and dispensaries, and in carrying into effect this appropriation the board of charities may contract with any hospital or dispensary existing in the District of Columbia April 1, 1906, and organized or established prior to that date, and with no others, $104,000; and the board of charities shall report to Congress at the beginning of its next session the terms of all contracts or agreements made hereunder up to December 1 next, the institutions with whom made, and the amount per annum involved in each contract or agreement.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 71, line 20, after the word "dispensaries," insert "including the Home for Incurables."

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, we have no objection to this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEIFER. Now, Mr. Chairman, affecting only the same thing, after the word "dispensary," in line 22, add the words "or said home," simply to make it harmonious.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the disbursing officer of the District of Columbia is authorized to advance to the agent of the board of children's guardians, upon requisitions previously approved by the auditor of the District of Columbia, and upon such security as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may require of said agent, sums of money not exceeding $200 at one time, to be used for expenses in placing and visiting children, or traveling on official business of the board, to be accounted for monthly on itemized vouchers to the accounting officers of the District of Columbia.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph beginning at line 13 on page 73 and ending at the end of line 22 on the same page. It is new, distinctive, and substantive legislation.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. May I ask the gentleman why he strikes that out? I can not conceive of any objection to it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not want to have any new legislation introduced into this bill.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The gentleman simply does it for the technical reason that it is new legislation?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Of course, that is the gentleman's right if he wishes to take the responsibility.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the care and maintenance of children under a contract to be made with the German Orphan Asylum by the board of charities not to exceed $1,000.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 13 strike out "one thousand" and insert "twelve hundred."

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, we will accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

For temporary Home for ex-Union Soldiers and Sailors, Grand Army of the Republic, namely: For superintendent, $1,000; janitor, $360, and cook, $360; maintainance, $3,280; in all, $5,000, to be expended under the direction of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and ex-soldiers and sailors of the Spanish war shall also be admitted to the Home.

Mr. BISHOP. Mr. Chairman, I submit the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 75, line 25, after the word "thousand," strike out the words "two hundred and eighty" and insert in lieu thereof the words "seven hundred and eighty," so as to read, "three thousand seven hundred and eighty dollars."

Mr. BISHOP. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I propose simply restores the amount that they received under the last bill. They very much need this money. They are already compelling the old soldiers to live on short rations so that they can have money enough to carry them through the present year. They need every dollar and more. I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. We will accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

WATER METERS.

For the purchase, installation, and maintenance of water meters to be placed in such private residences as may be directed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia; said meters at all times to remain the property of the District of Columbia; to be repaid from revenues of the water department at the rate of $20,000 per annum, beginning with the fiscal year to end June 30, 1908, $100,000.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have an explanation of this from the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the present condition of the water service in the District of Columbia is such as to make the Commissioners apprehensive that in a very short time, unless the use of water can in some way be diminished, there will be compelled to be a new reservoir and new aqueduct. It was also brought before the committee that at present the use of water in Washington is 220 gallons per person per day, which is three or four times as much as is considered necessary, and very much more than ordinary cities average. It appeared to us that the only way in which we could diminish this wasteful use of water was to put in meters, which are very simple and reliable contrivances. This will not increase the cost of the water to the users, and they will ultimately be paid for by the users of water, although originally paid for out of the District fund.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman inquired what the practice is in other cities—whether or not the consumers pay for the meters in the first instance?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Generally they do in other cities, but we thought it was fairer here to have the District pay for them in the first instance, and for this reason: That to compel poor people to pay the whole expense of a meter—from $10 to $20—at its original insertion will be quite a burden upon them, whereas if at first the District put it in and the consumer ultimately paid for it it would be a fairer method. Then we also understand that it would improve the quality of the water that we are now using; that the water which is used through a filtration plant when that plant is used nearly to its limit is apt to be impure if the supply is largely diminished, and if it is not used nearly up to its limit the water is of much better quality. So, both for the quality of the water and the economy of the water, we thought this was necessary, and it seemed to us it was exceedingly necessary that it should be done now, because in the last year there were times when we reached the limit of supply and the use on some days really was greater than the aqueduct was bringing into the city.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Is it intended under the operation of this law that the consumers shall pay a certain proportion each year, so that hereafter, in a certain number of years, they will finally own the meters?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. No. The consumers do not pay it. The city advances the money. Then the consumers pay water rent, and those rents will be made slightly larger, so that ultimately the meters will all be paid for out of the water rent and the city will still own the meters, but the users will have paid for it by a very slight increase upon their water taxes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, what would be a reasonable amount of water a day?

Mr. MADDEN. Sixty gallons.

Mr. SIMS. For a family?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Sixty gallons for each person—per capita.

Mr. SIMS. What about business houses where——

Mr. BURLESON. They have meters now.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. And hotels.

Mr. SIMS. And they are charged according to the water they use?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. This applies only to private residences.

Mr. BURLESON. I desire to supplement the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts by this statement: The information was brought to us that in the larger residences during the winter time frequently the faucets were permitted to be open and the water to run all the night in order to prevent the freezing of the pipes, and that in the small residences during the summer time the faucets were permitted to remain open in order that the occupants might have cooler water, resulting in a terrific useless waste of water.

Mr. PALMER. What is the average daily consumption?

Mr. BURLESON. Two hundred gallons per capita.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Who owns the meters already installed?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. In the large apartment houses the people themselves put them in.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I do not believe in the city paying for meters.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The city does not pay for them ultimately.

Mr. SIMS. This is what I am concerned about: Will the use of meters and the paying for water in proportion to the water used have a tendency to reduce the proper and normal use of water among the poor people so as to affect sanitary conditions?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not think it will.

Mr. MANN. Everybody knows it will. Of course it does wherever it is tried.

Mr. SIMS. That has been my theory, and I do not think we ought to do anything to bring about such a condition.

Mr. MANN. It prevents the use of water in bath tubs and elsewhere wherever tried.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Our theory was this: The increased cost will be so very slight that it will not prevent any family from using all they need, but it will simply prevent leaving spigots open all night or all day. That is the only way that the enormous use of water can be prevented.

Mr. SIMS. But the spigots are left open in hot weather by poor people in the summer time.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. They are left open in cold weather, too.

Mr. SIMS. But the larger houses leave them open in cold weather to keep the pipes from freezing.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Small houses have more danger of the freezing of pipes.

Mr. SIMS. That is the statement of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not agree with him on that.

Mr. SIMS. The poorer classes leave them open in summer in order to have cooler water to drink.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I understand that both classes leave them open.

Mr. SIMS. These people who want cool water to drink, I understand, are so poor they can not afford to buy ice. I am in favor of economy in a proper way in all these kind of things, but I am opposed to any regulation that will tend to produce insanitary conditions.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I agree with the gentleman heartily.

Mr. SIMS. I would like to hear from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the time of the gentleman will be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. About what is your estimate of cost per thousand gallons by the meter system?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I can not tell the gentleman that.

Mr. MADDEN. About 8 cents.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. Do I understand you to say that no family would be deprived of all the water they wanted to use?

Mr. SIMS. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the Chairman will permit, the Commissioners stated they had placed meters in their own houses as a test, and they found out by the use of the meters in their own houses their water bill had been slightly reduced from the charges that had been fixed for a hundred or a thousand gallons, or whatever it was, and from what it had been at the rate fixed by frontage, and that they had ample supply of water, without any effort to unreasonably curtail it; and they averaged about 60 gallons per capita.

Mr. MANN. The Commissioners' test in their own houses is pure nonsense. A great many tests have been made in the country that are much fairer than the test made by the three District Commissioners by putting water meters in their own private residences. They were watching themselves and intending to make no difference in the use of water. Wherever they use meters in the large department buildings throughout the country the owners take every possible method to prevent the use of water.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman have any knowledge of whether or not water meters have tended to such decrease in the use of water as to produce unsanitary results?

Mr. MANN. That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. MADDEN. Here is a question that was asked of the Commissioners about the cost of the water that went through the meters:

Mr. MADDEN. How much per thousand gallons do you charge where the water runs through the meter?

Commissioner BIDDLE. Three cents a thousand gallons.

He said 3 cents per thousand gallons. Ordinarily they charge 8 cents, but at this place they charge 3.

Mr. MANN. Ordinarily they charge 8 cents for 10,000 gallons.

Mr. DRISCOLL. How much does that come to for an ordinary family?

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose that a family should use 60 gallons a day for each person in the family, and there were five people in the family, that would be 300 gallons, and that multiplied by 365 would make about a hundred thousand gallons, would it not?

Mr. DRISCOLL. How much does that come to per year?

Mr. MADDEN. That would be about $3 a year.

Mr. MANN. They charge three times as much here for water as they do in the city of Chicago, where they use meters, and the meter rate in Chicago is nearly twice or three times as much as the frontage rate.

Mr. SIMS. What will it cost an ordinary dwelling house to have these meters?

Mr. MANN. In an ordinary dwelling house, that is fitted with bath tubs, in this city, where the bath tubs are used, with the ordinary wastage and plumbing, it will cost $20 a year.

Mr. SIMS. With the meter?

Mr. MANN. With the meter.

Mr. MADDEN. Here is what is said in the hearings:

Mr. FITZGERALD. Take a house 25 feet wide and three stories high. Can you give an idea of the water rate for that?

Colonel BIDDLE. About $7.50.

Mr. GILLETTE of Massachusetts. You now mean?

In reply to that he said that it would be reduced, if the meter was introduced, from $7.50 to $5.

Mr. SIMS. Do they not have to include an extra charge to pay for this meter?

Mr. MADDEN. No. I asked this question:

How much per thousand gallons do you charge where the water runs through the meter?

Colonel Biddle replied:

Three cents per 1,000 gallons. I may state that when I lived in Nashville I paid $24 a year water rent, and now in Washington, while I am occupying a house about the same size, I pay only $7.50.

Mr. SIMS. He does not pay by meter here.

Mr. MADDEN. He does. Mr. FITZGERALD asked him this question:

But you were not Commissioner when you lived in Nashville?

[Laughter.]

And Mr. Macfarland said:

I would like to say for the record that while I am strongly in favor of putting in meters in all residences, I would like very much to see the entire National Government service metered just as the large business establishments are. I do not believe the excessive consumption is by the private water takers.

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask this question about that. Suppose this $100,000 is expended; how long will it be until we have to increase the permanent water facilities anyway?

Mr. MADDEN. A fair estimate is that if all the houses in the District secured their water by meters now, it would add four times the present capacity to the water plant. It would make the plant four times bigger than to-day, because they assume that 60 to 65 gallons per capita would be the quantity of water used, whereas to-day it is 220 gallons.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I saw this morning——

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended for five minutes.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not care to occupy further time.

Mr. SIMS. I noticed this morning in the newspapers that a bill had been reported in the Senate for $1,000,000 to buy some park extensions, and while we are adding to our free shade area, which is extraordinarily large already, I am constrained to say that I do not think we ought to reduce the free use of water; and therefore I make the point of order against the section.

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late to make the point of order.

Mr. SIMS. Was not that agreed to, that there was to be no advantage taken of it?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I would like to say to the gentleman——

Mr. SIMS. I wish to reserve the point of order for further discussion of this question.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The whole object of this meter, I say to the gentleman from Tennessee, is not to deprive the people of all the water that they would properly use. It is simply to prevent an improvident waste of water on the one hand, instead of incurring a large expense for new service, new conduits, new reservoirs, which, if the water is not wasted, will not be needed for years.

Mr. SIMS. How many years?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Why, in the opinion of the engineer before the committee, he said an indefinite time; but certainly for a number of years. Otherwise, if it is not done, an appropriation must be made at once for a resurvey, if we allow the people to go on wasting the water that they do not use and do not pay for. They take advantage here, as in many other things, of the liberality of those controlling the water system to waste it, not to use it. This is simply to prevent waste.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I am not in favor of wasting the water, but would rather have some waste than an insufficient use of the water, and that is what I am afraid of. I have no objection to legislation on an appropriation bill, but I do not want anything that will have a tendency to cause the poorer people to be cut off from the fullest use of water for drinking, bathing, and for cleansing purposes, or any other possible healthful use of it.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The proposition is not to cut it off from the poor people, but to cut off the waste.

Mr. SIMS. If they are so poor that they can not buy ice, and let it run so as to get it cool, certainly they would not use enough for proper, healthful purposes. If this $100,000 is appropriated, you have got to wait until that money is returned; and it is only a little while before you will have to have increased water facilities. It is only a little while ago since we spent an immense sum of money for a filtration plant, which was represented would be entirely sufficient to give an abundance of good, pure, and healthful water. Now that filtration plant has hardly been put in operation, and hardly had an opportunity for the preliminary filtration plant to be tried, before we are asked for another addition to the filtration plant. It is reported to us that that filtration plant, which was represented to us would be sufficient, has proven insufficient.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. The gentleman is mistaken about that. It has not proven to be insufficient, but in case of a flood—which we have not had for the last few years, in case we had one—it would not be sufficient.

Mr. SIMS. Then it is proved that it is not sufficient.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. Sufficient for the present.

Mr. MANN. But if you have the rains as we have them now?

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. You will get muddy water if you do not use the coagulant.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. May I make a suggestion to the gentleman?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The gentleman seems to be troubled with the idea that in any event we are only postponing for a short time the installation of a duplicate water plant; but it seems to me that, as a matter for mathematical calculation, we are now using 220 gallons per capita. If we reduce that to 70 gallons per capita, which is a reasonable amount, that is only a third as much. Therefore the water which now supplies our city, only a third of it being used, will supply a city three times as big as this; so that the present water supply will be sufficient for the city until it is three times as big as it is now, or, say, twice as big as it is now. That will certainly be a great many years hence, and considering the enormous expense—and a new water supply is one of the most frightful expenses any city ever has to pay—if we can save it by such a comparatively economic system as this, it seems to me it is extremely desirable.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What proportion of the houses in Washington would this appropriation supply with meters?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not know, but I understand about 10,000 houses.

Mr. MANN. It would not supply 10,000 at the rate the gentleman says they cost. I will say to the gentleman that they can not install meters at $10 apiece, or anything like that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think we can.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Say $15 apiece.

Mr. MANN. It will cost $10 apiece to put them in, and then there would be the comparative cost between the few who had the meters and the people who did not have the meters while this system is being installed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit me to explain just what this amendment does. At present all of the revenues from the water service are appropriated indefinitely for a continuation of the water service of the District. Five thousand dollars was heretofore appropriated to install meters in private residences, and that has been done. The result has been satisfactory, not only to the officials, but to the people in whose residences the meters have been installed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should like to have the time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER] extended five minutes, so that I can complete my statement. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] had the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER] was recognized. Unanimous consent is asked that he may be allowed to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Commissioners now ask that this action be taken. The water revenues at present are required for the necessary extensions of mains, and they ask that the Federal Government advance $100,000 to the District, so that water meters may be installed, and that the District repay that $100,000 out of the water revenues in five payments. Now, the committee were satisfied——

Mr. MANN. This is a good deal worse than I supposed it was.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. The Federal Government is to make a loan to the water department.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not think that statement is entirely accurate. It comes out of the appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It comes half from the District and half from the Federal Government. The advance is made by the District and Federal Government to the water-revenue fund. The committee was satisfied that either one of two things had to be done: Either they had to commence to consider now the advisability of duplicating the present aqueduct system—that is, building a new aqueduct from Great Falls, with the necessary increase in reservoir accommodations—or else attempt by some means to reduce the consumption of the water. It was shown that the per capita consumption per day here is 220 gallons; that in other cities a reasonable consumption per capita is 60 to 70 gallons. From the experience already had, it is believed that the installation of the meters would reduce the consumption and at the same time, with the people using all the water that was necessary, the cost of water to the consumer would be slightly decreased.

Mr. WALDO. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I know there is now a bid to furnish water meters in the Isthmian Canal Zone, as good meters as can be had in the market, at $7 apiece, delivered at the Isthmus of Panama, and I believe they can be delivered and installed here at certainly not to exceed $10 apiece. They certainly could be installed here for $10 instead of $15 apiece.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is probably true that the water consumption in the District of Columbia is comparatively large. It is to that fact that we owe the beauty of the District. The gentleman from Tennessee is afraid that the putting in of meters will have an insanitary effect. I will tell the gentleman from Tennessee that it will have a much wider effect than that. The moment that you install meters in a city, as a rule, they quit sprinkling the lawn. Why should a man who has a lawn and wants to keep it green pay for an extra amount of water at the same rate that the man pays for water consumed in the family?

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not know it to be a fact that in the city from which he comes the authorities charge the householder for the use of the hose, in addition to the price paid for the water when they use the hose?

Mr. MANN. They charge $3 a year for the use of the hose, but the amount of water that is consumed at the meter rates amounts to $10 or $15 a year. I took up this matter once before and made an investigation of it. There is not a place where a water meter is put in but that it does not restrict the use of water for legitimate purposes, whether it be for the lawn or the bath tub. The principal waste of water, let me say, is not letting the water run in the summer time in order to get it cool nor in the winter time for the purpose of preventing it freezing. That is an exceptional thing. They let it run a little while in the summer time to let the hot water out of the pipe and they let it run in some cases, perhaps, in the winter time, but the principal waste is through improper plumbing. I will guarantee that there are more than 60 per cent—yes, 75 per cent—of the closets in this town to-day leaking water all the time and no effort made to stop it. The water running continuously either through the faucets or through the closets is where the waste of water comes, and the District makes no effort to stop it in the inspection of plumbing or in any other respect.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Is it not true that the people, if they have to pay for water through meters, if there is defective plumbing will see to it and correct it themselves? They will have the plumbing repaired and look after it more carefully. Water flowing into the sewers because of defective plumbing is waste, is it not?

Mr. MANN. That is pure waste, but this is not the only way to correct that waste. That can easily be corrected by any sort of inspection.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Each individual should inspect his own plumbing.

Mr. MANN. That is true.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he doesn't think that the committee made a mistake and commenced at the wrong end with the meters? Why not put the meters at the hotels and livery stables?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are there now.

Mr. MANN. All of the large establishments have meters. A few years ago I put a meter in an apartment building in the city of Chicago, and I pay more in that building for water for a little flat than you pay for a house in this town, or for a house in Chicago, for that matter. I do not know but that there ought to be a system of meters installed gradually, but the water rates ought to be lowered at the same time when the meter is put in. The water rate where a meter is put in will average three times the amount that is paid on the frontage rate, and if we install meters we should put down the rates, so that people will be encouraged to use the water.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I would like to inquire why the water meters have been installed in the hotels and apartment houses and livery stables—whether they were installed by the people themselves for economy's sake or whether they were forced upon them?

Mr. PERKINS. It stops waste.

Mr. MANN. I can tell the gentleman. There is no way to measure water in a large hotel or livery stable except through a meter. There is no other way of getting at the consumption of the amount as there is in a private family by the front foot.

Mr. DRISCOLL. But if they pay so much a year it makes no difference in the cost to them whether they use 100 gallons or 1,000,000 gallons.

Mr. PERKINS. No; but when they have a meter they do not use as much as when they pay a lump rate.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I wanted to know whether they were put in by themselves for the sake of economy or whether they were forced upon them.

Mr. MANN. The District requires them to put in meters, because there is no way of ascertaining the amount of water used in a livery stable except by a meter.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois by what authority he states that it is easy to measure the use of the quantity of water in private families where they own front lawns and one man and the members of his family may keep the hose going all day?

I know cases where they use twice as much water on one lawn as they do on the next adjoining.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. I did not say it was easy to ascertain the amount. I made no such statement as that.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman said substantially that.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I made no such statement as that. The gentleman is usually wrong when he quotes me.

Mr. KEIFER. And the gentleman from Illinois is usually mad when he finds he is in a hole. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman from Illinois never could get mad at the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], whatever else he got mad at.

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; he does, for I was in good humor. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Well, it is so exceptional that the gentleman is otherwise that of course he must have been in good humor. The gentleman always insinuates that somebody else is mad, and he is about the only man in the House I have ever seen really angry. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEIFER. I don't know when that was, and I would like to have the gentleman call the witnesses.

Mr. MANN. Oh, they are here and there and everywhere. What I said was that there was no other way of measuring the amount to be charged at livery stables or hotels. At houses they measure by the frontage and the size of the house, and while it is true that does not measure the amount of water used, it is some basis of measurement, which can not be used at a livery stable or at a hotel with any fairness. Now, I do not say that water meters ought not to be installed, but I say that this matter has not received the consideration that it ought to have, because it is a serious problem. Provide water meters, and you cut off four times out of five the use of water for either sprinkling the streets in front of the houses or for the lawns in front of the houses or for the care of the plants around the houses which is one of the beauties of Washington. Water ought to be and is cheap. Air is cheap, and we ought to be able to provide the people with fresh air in the city of Washington and with fresh water—good, clean, wholesome water—the cheapest thing that we can give.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, this is a matter that can be brought up in a separate bill and be heard, and then everybody will have an opportunity to inform himself. I am not informed. The only information I have is what I got here to-day. I am sincerely afraid that it will affect the health of the District. We have had an immense amount of typhoid fever, which we seem to have in part got rid of by the filtration plant. Therefore, I reluctantly insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that no point of order was reserved.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, I think I withheld the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that the gentleman made his point too late.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, out of fairness to the gentleman I must say this, and I trust no Member of the House will interfere with the agreement I made with the gentleman, that I made an agreement with the gentleman from Tennessee that when this came up he should ask a question, and that if later he wished to raise the point of order, even after discussion, I would not then raise the point that it was too late. Therefore I trust that no other Member will do it now.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I insist that long after this was under discussion the point of order was made. I don't know anything about this private agreement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that general debate had been had before any suggestion was made as to a point of order. The Chair can not be mistaken about that for this reason: Before this paragraph was reached the Chair suggested to the clerk at the Speaker's table that there might be a point of order raised to this paragraph, and both the Chair and the clerk at the Speaker's table were waiting alert to ascertain whether such a point would be made or reserved, and it was neither made nor reserved. The Reporter's notes further bear out the statement of the Chair.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, the Chair is correct about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The first sentence uttered by the gentleman from Tennessee, according to the Reporter's notes, was:

Mr. Chairman, I would like to have this explained by the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the Chair is entirely correct, but I notified the gentleman in charge of the bill, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], chairman of the subcommittee, beforehand that I was going to make a point of order; that I was not satisfied about it. He then suggested that I do not raise the point of order, but that I give him an opportunity to explain it. I told him that I might not object to it after hearing it explained. He asked me if I would not refrain from doing it, and said after explanation I might do so. I said, "It will then be too late." He said, "I think not. Nobody can make it but you, but you can make it." Now, I have done this in the utmost good faith, and notified the subcommittee beforehand, and I have acted in accordance with the agreement with the committee. Of course if the Chair can not carry out that agreement, why, then, the Chair is not to be held responsible; but I did this through a solemn agreement and upon their request.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the House can not be bound by an agreement of gentlemen.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, well, I know that, Mr. Chairman. Does any gentleman in this House want to put the committee in that attitude or me in that attitude?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The gentleman has stated what I tried to state, but the Chair did not understand me. It was an explicit agreement between the gentleman and myself, and the gentleman agreed he would not make the point of order at first, and I agreed if he made it afterwards I would not raise the point of order, and I hope no other Member will. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman now be allowed to make the point of order, and I trust nobody will object.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, in the interest of orderly procedure and to avoid embarrassment on these questions I think it ought to be understood there is but one method to raise the point of order. If we are to respect agreements between Members of the House it will lead to no end of trouble and embarrassment.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. And a private agreement at that.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And a personal agreement at that; and I accordingly object to changing the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the point of order to this paragraph be allowed to be made at this time, and to that the gentleman from Indiana objects.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I think there is but one thing I can do to keep good faith with the gentleman from Tennessee, and although I heartily am in favor of this paragraph and am very sorry to have it go out, I move that the paragraph be stricken out. [Applause.]

Mr. PALMER. It depends upon the committee whether you do that or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the paragraph be stricken out.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts) there were—ayes 38, noes 16.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill and amendments to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DALZELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 18198—the District of Columbia appropriation bill—and had instructed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there a separate vote demanded upon any of the amendments? If not, the vote will be taken on the amendments as a whole.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter from the President of the United States, which was read, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I submit herewith a letter of the Secretary of War, with accompanying documents, including a form of a resolution suggested for passage by the Congress.

This letter refers to the appalling catastrophe which has befallen San Francisco and neighboring cities, a catastrophe more appalling than any other of the kind that has befallen any portion of our country during its history. I am sure that there is need on my part of no more than a suggestion to the Congress in order that this resolution may be at once passed. But I urge that instead of appropriating a further sum of $1,000,000 as recommended by the Secretary of War, the appropriation be for a million and a half dollars. The supplies already delivered or en route for San Francisco approximate in value a million and a half dollars, which is more than we have the authority in law as yet to purchase. I do not think it safe for us to reckon upon the need of spending less than a million in addition. Large sums are being raised by private subscription in this country, and very generous offers have been made to assist us by individuals of other countries, which requests, however, I have refused as in my judgment there is no need of any assistance from outside our own borders—this refusal of course in no way lessening our deep appreciation of the kindly sympathy which has prompted such offers.

The detailed account of the action of the War Department is contained in the appendices to the letter of the Secretary of War. At the moment our concern is purely with meeting the terrible emergency of the moment. Later I shall communicate with you as to the generous part which I am sure the National Government will take in meeting the more permanent needs of the situation, including of course rebuilding the great governmental structures which have been destroyed.

I hope that the action above requested can be taken to-day.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 21, 1906.

TRANSPORTATION OF DUTIABLE MERCHANDISE WITHOUT APPRAISEMENT.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 11037 as a privileged bill and ask unanimous consent to have it considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up the following privileged bill, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11037) relating to the transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement.

The SPEAKER. The genteman from New York asks unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I will be compelled to object.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 11037.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the bill indicated.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11037) relating to the transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement, Mr. HINSHAW in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the privileges of the first section of the act approved June 10, 1880, relating to the transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement, be, and the same are hereby, extended to the port of Buffalo, in the State of New York.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, the object of this legislation is to enable merchandise, and especially cattle, shipped from Canada to ports in this country to pass immediately through Buffalo to the place of destination without being stopped in Buffalo for appraisement. In other words, it allows goods intended for shipment abroad to pass from Canada through to New York without being held up at Buffalo for appraisement. It seems to be quite necessary that live stock arriving in Buffalo under these conditions should not be unloaded on the way.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. It obviates delay?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; that is the real object to be gained.

Mr. MANN. How does that benefit Buffalo?

Mr. ALEXANDER. This bill simply places Buffalo within section 1 of the act of June 10, 1880. All of our large ports are now within this section, and it aids shipments passing through Buffalo.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand from my colleague that he is working for the general interest of the United States and not for the city he represents.

Mr. MANN. That is what I could not understand. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. I may say that Buffalo wants it.

Mr. Chairman, I move the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. HINSHAW, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11037) relating to the transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement, and directed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that the same do pass.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill will be considered as engrossed and read a third time——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I will be forced to object.

The SPEAKER. That is within the gentleman's province.

The question was taken on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that this day may be designated as Friday, or in place of a Friday, for consideration of bills upon the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I shall be forced to object.

TRADE WITH CHINA.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Georgia rise?

Mr. GRIGGS. To present a privileged report and resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia presents a privileged report and resolution, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed and bound in paper covers, for the use of the House of Representatives, 10,000 copies of the report on "Trade with China: American Methods and Trade Opportunities in the Markets of the Orient," by Raymond F. Crist and Harry R. Burrill, special agents of the Department of Commerce and Labor, from Monthly Consular and Trade Reports for January, 1906, to be distributed through the folding room of the House of Representatives.

The following amendment was read:

Strike out the word "ten," in line 2, and insert in lieu thereof the word "five."

The SPEAKER. Is the report from the Committee on Printing?

Mr. GRIGGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. I will ask the gentleman if there is any estimate of the cost.

Mr. GRIGGS. Yes, sir; $80.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. PALMER. To call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls for the regular order.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 1274. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building at Washington, N. C.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 3139. An act for the relief of Lorenzo A. Bailey—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

S. 4774. An act relating to the movements and anchorage of vessels in Hampton Roads, the harbors of Norfolk and Newport News, and adjacent waters, in the State of Virginia—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 5639. An act to provide for the erection of a public building at San Juan, P. R.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution of the following title:

S. R. 49. Joint resolution construing the joint resolution approved April 19, 1906, entitled "Joint resolution for the relief of sufferers from earthquake and conflagration on the Pacific coast."

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota submitted a request for leave of absence for two weeks, on account of important business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on granting the leave of absence requested by the gentleman from Minnesota. The Chair supposes this would require a motion.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I make the motion that the gentleman from Minnesota be granted the leave of absence requested.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that the gentleman from Minnesota have the leave asked.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that he was in doubt.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 43.

Mr. NEEDHAM. I demand tellers.

The SPEAKER (after counting). Twenty gentlemen have arisen; not a sufficient number; tellers are refused; and the House stands adjourned until to-morrow, at 12 o'clock.

Accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor submitting an estimate of appropriations for a light-vessel at Oxford Reef, Oregon—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, with a copy of a letter from the governor of New Mexico, a copy of a proposed amendment of the law relating to certain lands—to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, submitting an estimate of appropriation for furniture and repairs of public buildings—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6018) to enable the President of the United States to call an international conference for the purpose of securing an international agreement relative to the regulation of the emigration of aliens to the United States, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 3400); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CRUMPACKER, from the Committee on the Census, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 13671) to provide for the taking of a census of agricultural statistics in the year 1906 and every tenth year after the year 1905, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 3402); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. GREGG, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7676) authorizing the appointment of Allen V. Reed, now a captain on the retired list of the Navy, as a rear-admiral on the retired list of the Navy, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 3401); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. SULZER: A bill (H. R. 18498) for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of General Orders, No. 195, War Department, June 29, 1863, for the presentation of medals—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts: A bill (H. R. 18499) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay a sum of money to the Whittier Home Association, of Amesbury, Mass.—to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. BRADLEY: A bill (H. R. 18500) to authorize the President of the United States to appoint a commission to consider and recommend a system of national parks for military, historical, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ELLIS: A bill (H. R. 18501) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River, and to establish it as a post-road—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. PARSONS: A bill (H. R. 18502) to empower the Secretary of War, under certain restrictions, to authorize the construction, extension, and maintenance of wharves, piers, and other structures on lands underlying harbor areas and navigable streams and bodies of water in or surrounding Porto Rico and the islands adjacent thereto—to the Committee on Insular Affairs.

By Mr. BURTON of Delaware: A resolution (H. Res. 411) providing for the printing of the accounts, papers, and documents in the case of Henry Fisher's services rendered to John Paul Jones—to the Committee on Printing.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were introduced and severally referred, as follows:

By Mr. BENNETT of Kentucky: A bill (H. R. 18503) granting an increase of pension to John Burns—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BROWNLOW: A bill (H. R. 18504) granting an increase of pension to James T. Rambo—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. COLE: A bill (H. R. 18505) granting an increase of pension to M. Belle May—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GUDGER: A bill (H. R. 18506) granting an increase of pension to Mahala Jones—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HALE: A bill (H. R. 18507) granting an increase of pension to Bailey P. Smith—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18508) granting an increase of pension to James F. Foster—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HEDGE: A bill (H. R. 18509) granting an increase of pension to Ellen L. Stone—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON: A bill (H. R. 18510) granting an increase of pension to Hugh R. Rutledge—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KLEPPER: A bill (H. R. 18511) for the relief of Samuel R. Couch—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. KLINE: A bill (H. R. 18512) granting a pension to Lucian Potteiger—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LACEY: A bill (H. R. 18513) granting an increase of pension to Sarah Watts—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. McLAIN: A bill (H. R. 18514) for the relief of D. H. Chamberlain and Pauline Chamberlain—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. RICHARDSON of Kentucky: A bill (H. R. 18515) granting an increase of pension to Martin Johnson—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18516) granting an increase of pension to Jacob T. Wood—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18517) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Ishmael H. Smith—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SAMUEL: A bill (H. R. 18518) granting an increase of pension to William W. Wertman—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SUNDAY, April 22, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock m., and was called to order by Hon. ALEXANDER MCDOWELL, Clerk of the House, who directed the reading of the following letter:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 22, 1906.

I hereby designate Hon. JOHN DALZELL, of Pennsylvania, to act as Speaker pro tempore this day.

J. G. CANNON, Speaker.

Mr. DALZELL accordingly assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The following prayer was offered by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.:

Infinite source of life and light and love, we thank Thee for that deep and abiding faith which holds us close to Thee through all the vicissitudes of life, for the star of hope which illumines our path when sorrows and disappointments gather thick and fast about us, for the ties of affection which bind us together into families and friendships which time nor space can sever; and as we gather here to-day in memory of those who made for themselves a place in our hearts we thank Thee that their characters, their works, their influence remain an inspiration to those who knew and loved them. Let the everlasting arms be about the dear ones who mourn their absence, and comfort them with the blessed hope of a reunion in a world where sorrows never come. Hear us, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE HON. GEORGE A. CASTOR.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions and move their adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. GEORGE A. CASTOR, late a Member of this House from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished career, the House, at the conclusion of the exercises of this day, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The question was taken; and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Members have leave for thirty days to print on the memorial services of this day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that Members desiring to print on the memorial services of this day shall have leave to do so. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, it was my sad duty on the 20th of February to announce the death of my colleague, Hon. GEORGE A. CASTOR, of the Third district of Pennsylvania, and to announce that another time I would ask that a day be set apart for proper consideration of his public services and character. By a special order of the House this day was set apart for that purpose.

The change to holding these memorial services on a Sunday has been a good one. The excitement and interest in pending legislation was frequently not ignored sufficiently, and the services lacked that repose and sanctity that belong to the memory of those gone before.

Mr. Speaker, our late colleague was born at Holmesburg, a part of the city of Philadelphia, on August 6, 1855, of humble but highly respected parentage. He attended the public schools of the village, but early in life entered a cloth house in the city. With that energy which characterized and made a success of his life, he at once proceeded to master the details of the business, and before long gained the reputation of being the best judge of cloth in the country. This knowledge became of vital importance when he determined to enlarge his business as a merchant tailor. This his experience and energy so developed that he soon had large establishments in New York and Boston in addition to his Philadelphia house. Success crowned his efforts, and at the expiration of some twenty years he retired with a moderate fortune, which by his excellent judgment in investments he greatly enlarged in later years.

GEORGE A. CASTOR is a striking example of a class of men of which our country has too few. Instead of retiring and enjoying that ease his work had made possible, he felt he owed some duty to his city and country, and began to take an active part in public affairs. A Republican in principles, he became an active worker in the organization of that party. He served on the city committee for fifteen years, his popularity in his district insuring his continued reelection. On the death of Hon. Henry Burk, representing the Third Pennsylvania Congressional district, some difficulty was experienced in finding a candidate.

The Third Pennsylvania district occupies a peculiar place in American politics. It is peculiar in the history of our country, owing to the record of Samuel J. Randall. With the strong conviction for the doctrine of protection which existed in the city of Philadelphia, Randall stood as the exponent of that wing of the Democratic party which believed in moderate protection. He had so stamped his impress on this district, which, though probably by conviction its constituents were Republicans, with high protective ideas, that his strong personality, honesty, and integrity had broken down party lines to such an extent that for nearly thirty years he was elected an honored Member to this House. Party lines were severed, and it was known as "the Randall district."

I state this fact because at the death of Henry Burk there was some difficulty in finding a candidate who would be sure to be returned as a Representative fully convinced of the soundness of the great doctrine of protection. Many were canvassed, and finally the selection was made of our late colleague, GEORGE A. CASTOR. It takes certain qualifications to carry that district, owing to the peculiar conditions to which I have referred. Mr. CASTOR was chosen, first, for his strong support of the doctrines of the Republican party; second, on account of his high standing as a business man for honesty and integrity, a man whose character could not be assailed, no matter how bitter the canvass might be, and, thirdly, through large charities, and a character so lovely that he won friendship and all felt he would make a sufficiently strong candidate to overcome whatever lukewarmness might exist there, owing to that feeling that existed for the late Samuel J. Randall.

It was a wise choice, Mr. Speaker, for Mr. CASTOR carried that district sucessfully by a very large majority—24,374—and in spite of the fact that the sentiment to which I have referred was tried to be revived and made a part of the canvass, that the son of that distinguished man of Pennsylvania, Samuel J. Randall, was run in opposition to Mr. CASTOR, and there was an independent candidate, Mr. CASTOR was successfully returned to this House, and took his seat. Had his life been spared he would have made quite a mark as a Member. Unfortunately for him, when he was reelected, by a still larger majority, to the present Congress that terrible disease had taken hold of his frame which medical skill has not the power to allay, and he fell a victim to it.

Mr. Speaker, there is not much that can be said of Mr. CASTOR'S services in this House. We all know that a new Member has but little opportunity, either on committee or on the floor of this House, to show what may be in him; but I believe that with his strong business training and the qualifications that he showed, had his life been spared he would have been a most useful Member.

But, Mr. Speaker, no reference to GEORGE A. CASTOR would be complete without entering into those personalities of home life and friendship and charity which, after all, are the attributes that are the strongest characteristics of a man who has served his fellow-men.

Fame is good and great, and all honor to those who achieve it in public life; but the man who leaves a record of goodheartedness, good will, and charity to his neighbors is part of that leaven that goes to raise the standard of life on this earth of ours, whose influence permeates in that quiet, silent way that lifts up mankind to that brotherhood which is the highest attribute, nearing divinity.

The friends of Mr. CASTOR could not be numbered. He was so beloved in his own city that, as I say, he ran in a district in which he did not reside, because his strength of kindliness was not limited merely to his home. Yet his strength of love for the locality of his birth—Holmesburg—is another characteristic that showed the man. When he had accumulated this competence he sought no fashionable or notorious place in which to build a home to provide for his family, but with that tie for the place of his birth he went back to Holmesburg and there erected a home, with every comfort and every elegance, in which his family could pass their days. Sir, those of us who were appointed officially to attend the funeral of Mr. CASTOR saw that home and saw the bereavement that had entered into it which spoke of him as a father and as a husband. As a father he was most indulgent. His children were devoted to him with a love that can come only through such treatment by a parent as he gave to them. He belonged to many societies, and there were from those societies large delegations gathered on the beautiful lawn. It was a perfect day, and of all the pathetic sights that I saw which touched me most and which showed the character of the man was a woman who stood at a respectful distance clad in garments that showed she belonged to the poorest of the poor. At either side clung to her skirts two little children. That picture showed what that man had done in his neighborhood, and this woman came to give that testimony of his kindness. Her very shrinking showed that she did not feel comfortable in the surroundings, but it showed that her gratitude was greater than her pride, and she came to pay the only tribute which she could in her position—to stand at a respectful distance, with bowed head, expressing gratitude for all that he had done for her. That, Mr. Speaker, showed the man.

As we stood there and heard the beautiful ritual of the Episcopal Church read among the flowers that filled the large hall of the mansion, sent by many friends, we knew that we were attending officially the obsequies of a character who in his own home received the most precious tribute that can be given to a man. All the neighbors—his friends—were there, rich and poor, high and low, to pay tribute at the going hence, we know not whither, leaving behind him that which is most precious—a memory that lingers of the goodly deeds and kindly words and charitable acts of one who has gone from among us.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege and honor of knowing the late Mr. GEORGE A. CASTOR probably longer and better than any other Representative in Congress. Mr. CASTOR was a resident of the district which I have the honor to represent, and a resident of the ward in which I live. He was born and brought up at Holmesburg, just 3 miles from Torresdale, Philadelphia, to which place I moved shortly after my marriage in 1887. In 1900, while I was in Florida, I was persuaded to come back and become a candidate for select council of the city of Philadelphia, to represent a new ward, which was to be known as the Thirty-fifth Ward, which was cut off from the old Twenty-third Ward. When I returned the first difficulty that presented itself, inasmuch as it was a new ward, and I myself a comparatively new resident of it, was to find somebody who would be willing to accompany me in the canvass.

Among those who rallied around me in that connection was Mr. GEORGE A. CASTOR, and I can say here that throughout the canvass which I made, a very arduous canvass, because it was in the spring and we had to drive sometimes for miles over bad roads and through mire which would come sometimes up to the hubs of the wheels, it was Mr. CASTOR'S wonderful faculty of looking at the bright side of things, his cheerfulness, his personality, his hearty laugh, that made what would otherwise have been an arduous task an agreeable one. The villages and towns we visited where he had no friends previously he at once made friends. It was one of Mr. CASTOR'S wonderful peculiarities—his faculty for making friends, not for the time being, not for the moment, because having once known GEORGE CASTOR everybody was glad to see his bright face, to shake his hand, and to again come in contact with his strong and cheerful personality. Much has been said in regard to Mr. CASTOR'S early life, his struggles and his wonderful successes.

Mr. CASTOR'S life was a typical American one and his achievements an example of what, under our Government, opportunities taken advantage of will result in.

Everything that Mr. CASTOR had he had won for himself by his own individual efforts, and to my mind it was a remarkable thing, already alluded to, that his one great desire was to go back to the place of his birth, to be among his old schoolfellows, and to become a leader among them. There is an expression that a prophet is not without honor save in his own country. In this instance the reverse of that proposition was true, because Mr. CASTOR very soon became honored and looked up to in his old home, first, as the leader of the ward in which he lived, and particularly the leader of those among whom he had been born.

When the time came in 1892 for the city of Philadelphia and the eastern part of the State to look about for a candidate for Congressman at large. Mr. CASTOR was selected, but was defeated by the very small number of 12 votes. It had been up to that time, and remained afterwards, the laudable ambition of Mr. CASTOR'S life to represent his city and State in the Congress of the United States, and no one more than myself rejoiced when the opportunity came and he was nominated for Congress from the Third Congressional district. The success of the campaign he went through in that district, where he was not particularly well known, and the friends he made and kept afterwards, as I said before of the campaign that we made together, were due entirely to his own indefatigable energy. He was a man who would sacrifice his time at any moment, day or night, to achieve the end in view, and it was through this energy that he became in a few weeks as well known in the new district he was to represent as in the district in which he was born and in which he resided.

I feel quite sure, with my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS], that had Mr. CASTOR been spared these same splendid qualities which had made for him the position he occupied in the business world would have made him one of the strongest and best Representatives in this National Government. However, those are things not left to us to determine, but belong to Almighty God. We are told, and it is demonstrated every hour of the day, that we can not take anything with us out of this world. Is it not, then, well to have left behind a memory, an impression, such as Mr. CASTOR did? His strong personality, his warm-heartedness, his cheerfulness, and his desire to assemble about him not only friends of his later days, but the friends of his youth, will be a monument more lasting than had he left behind palaces and gold untold.

The Lord of life so orbited his sun
That ev'ning shadows fell just when his noontide shone
On widened fields. With new tasks scarce begun,
He heard the whisper, "Rest! Your work is done."

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the most exalted position ever attained by any mere man in the world's history perhaps was that occupied by Julius Cæsar. The most brilliant and entertaining of all the historians has said of Cæsar that he was a poet second to none but Virgil; he was a historian second to none but Tacitus; he was an orator second to none but Cicero, and he was the very greatest military captain of that or any other age. And yet when we look back over the centuries and scan this brilliant career of this highest type of humanity, who would not have rather lived a life of honest usefulness, devoted to making mankind happier and better than to have ruled with an iron hand all the vast countries that stretch from the Tweed to the Tigris? It is indeed true that "he that ruleth his own spirit is greater than he that taketh a city."

Our friend, GEORGE A. CASTOR, captured no city and ruled over no empire in the worldly sense, and yet he captured a stronger citadel and ruled a more tempestuous empire when he so measured his own life and shaped his own conduct as to leave behind him an unsullied name. When the infidel has ended his scoffing and when the agnostic has propounded his last question and we are not able to answer it, still, somehow, we know that the actions of men and nations are interwoven with and measured by a universal moral code, and that in the long run it is well with men and with nations, too, to do what is honorable and what is right. Somehow, in some inscrutable way, the human family in every age and in every land have acknowledged the binding obligations of this universal moral law. A thousand differing creeds and a thousand different religions are at last but a thousand frail, imperfect efforts to give expression to and to formulate this moral law. High over all human ambitions, above and beyond the achievements of sense, there is a source from whence this moral sentiment emanates, and death always brings us to its sober consideration. We do not flatter our dead friends when we for a moment turn away from the numerous deaths of a ruined city to give expression to the worth of a single individual. Indeed, the Divine Founder of our religion turned a while from his path of leading and teaching multitudes to mourn at the grave of Lazarus and to comfort the two sisters who were benumbed by sorrow. We but give expression to the magnitude of a human soul and prove true to that part of our nature which forces us to see and realize in a larger measure those calamities which are near and which befall us than we do those which occur at a distance and among strangers. The mother is not to be condemned who would sacrifice a hundred strangers to save her own child, and we are not to be criticised, because GEORGE A. CASTOR was indeed entirely worthy of all the affection shown his memory, even if we do pour out our oblations in the midst of the smoke and ashes of a desolated city.

On opposite sides of the Roman forum there stood in the olden days two beautiful monuments, one representing Romulus and Remus being suckled by a wild wolf, and it stood there as an object lesson to remind the people of the humble and obscure origin of that opulent city that had become the mistress of the world. On the other side of the forum stood the other monument, representing Pegasus, with eyes aloft and wings outstretched soaring toward the sun. This monument stood as an object lesson also, to teach the people that although the city ruled every shore of the Mediterranean and although the Appian Way was thronged with caravans loaded with tribute from every land, yet there still remained other conquests for a still wider domain.

So, too, in the life of GEORGE A. CASTOR two similar monuments could be appropriately erected. One representing a poor boy without purple blood or ancient lineage struggling for an education and laboring in a tailor shop for his daily bread. The other representing the successful business man with a palatial home, blessed by a young, devoted, and accomplished wife, and gathered at his knee three beautiful promising children; the leader of his city and an honored Member of Congress.

He died in the prime of life, leaving a host of friends who were saddened by the loss of one of the best and most genial friends, one of the truest and most useful of our distinguished public men. To his wife and children he left more than any comfortable fortune or palatial home could bring, because he left behind a successful life as a model for the encouragement of thousands of other poor American boys to demonstrate the fact that fortune and business success are open to all in this great Republic and may be achieved without wronging or oppressing a single human being. Such a life lived in such a way, leaving behind such a memory, is infinitely greater than the diadem of the Cæsars. It is the highest type of successful American citizenship, which is the highest that has ever been afforded to the contemplation of the human family. So let us pause amidst the affairs of state and drop a tear upon the honored grave of GEORGE A. CASTOR.

When friendship or love our sympathies moved,
When truth in a glance should appear,
The lips may beguile with a dimple or smile,
But the test of affection's a tear.

Too oft is a smile but the hypocrite's wile
To mask detestation or fear.
Give me the sad sigh whilst the soul-telling eye
Is dimmed for the time with a tear.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, on the 20th day of last February, when the flag above the House of Representatives fluttered down to half mast, the American people witnessed the mute emblem of a nation's grief for the loss of one of her honored and favored sons—Congressman GEORGE A. CASTOR.

In the more than seven years' service I have had in this body the saddest of the lessons that I have learned is that the tremendous labors incident to a seat in this body make our Members prematurely old. In these few years I have seen the lines of care and the marks of age steal rapidly into faces that a little while ago were unmarked and unlined. Sir, he who gives of his substance to the common people is entitled to credit. What then, sir, shall be a fitting reward for GEORGE A. CASTOR and others like him, who gave up the very vital elements of their being for the public good?

Ah, sir, to be a Member of the House of Representatives of the United States—in all the wide world round I know of no position of higher honor or loftier duty. And, in my judgment, since the ages began there has never been gathered together within four walls any body of men of greater ability and more lofty character than the Members of the House of Representatives of the American Congress.

Here we stand, holding our credentials direct from the hands of the people; and we are so near to them that we feel each day the very heart throbs of the uncounted millions of the common people of our race.

At different times and at different places in the history of the world men have gained some political positions by wealth, by chance, or by intrigue; but not in the House of Representatives. When a man presents himself before the bar of this House to take the oath as one of its Members he comes bearing in his hands a dignified commission from a quarter of a million of his race.

Thus it was that GEORGE A. CASTOR came to us here in this House, and the noble attributes of his soul have added one more imperishable memory to the legions of those that cluster round this historic hall.

It frequently happens that when a public man dies possessed of no earthly estate that fact is heralded abroad as prima facie proof of his great virtue. Personally I am disinclined to cry out against this custom, because individual poverty is likely to be the chief monument that will mark the end of my public career, and I have no desire to encourage those who may come after me to mutilate it. However, I may remark in passing that when a man dies poor it may be evidence of an abundance of virtue or a paucity of industry.

In view of the lesson it teaches, it is not inappropriate to remark at this time that when GEORGE CASTOR passed away he was a man of some wealth. But, sir, that fortune of his is a joint monument to his industry and his honor. Not a dollar of it represented ill-gotten gains or hard bargains driven with his fellow-men. On the contrary, the manner in which he acquired a competence may well be taken as an object lesson by all of those who linger after him. He made his money in a great business enterprise that gave needed employment and generous wages to hundreds and hundreds of his fellow-men.

The financial career of GEORGE A. CASTOR was akin to the attribute of mercy, as told by Avon's bard. It was not strained. It was a great business career that blessed alike the employer and the employees. In all his life he never wrung an unfair dollar from the hand of toil, and the humblest workingman in his beloved Commonwealth was as welcome a guest across his doorway as those of wealth or renown.

There was, perhaps, no man in this body who more closely scanned the proceedings of this House than he did. I have been told that there was no closer reader of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in the House than he was. And his wide information on all topics connected with our legislative work proved the truth of that statement. It was his firm opinion that no man could be a well-equipped legislator who did not keep in close touch with the proceedings of Congress in their entirety.

At a reasonably early age in life he attained a competence, and could readily have spent the remaining years of his life in ease and idleness. But all his life he had been an active man. He was full of life and energy and always had been. He had been a hard worker in the early days in his little tailor shop, and he remained a hard worker until that business expanded into gigantic proportions in three of the greatest cities in America.

In his young manhood he carried a torch in the political parades for Rutherford B. Hayes. And in the days of his ripe manhood he was one of the Representatives that Pennsylvania sent to the capital of the nation to uphold the hands of Theodore Roosevelt.

He disliked to stand upon his feet and speak before a crowded assembly. With diffidence and modesty he put aside opportunities for public debate. Yet there were few men in this legislative body who could state a proposition more clearly or make an argument with the rare tact and ability that he displayed when seated in the committee room or around the council board of his party. But he seemed to shrink from addressing a great audience like the House of Representatives.

His personality exemplified in a high degree both modesty and ability—a combination all too rare in the common humanity of our day. He was ever ready to give a helping hand in any good cause, provided his name was not paraded at the forefront of the enterprise or his name exploited in connection therewith. He once remarked in my presence that so long as he could help in the attainment of a good object he did not care where the glory went. A disposition like that is a rare jewel to ornament the interior of any man.

He was a man who made the cultivation of common sense the main object of his intellectual pursuit. Those in this House best acquainted with him soon found that he was a man of keen foresight and rare good judgment. The common sense in his disposition had been developed to such an extent that it became something closely akin to genius.

It was never my good fortune to have known Mr. CASTOR'S family; but having known him, and recognized the many great and warm qualities of his nature, I can, in some measure, realize their sense of loss and desolation. My heart goes out to them in this the hour of their affliction.

It is no vain boast to say that he began life on the lowest round of the ladder, while the hour of his death found him occupying one of the most honored and exalted positions that man was ever called upon to fill.

All the intervening rounds of that ladder he scaled aided only by his great force and pluck, supplemented by a warm and generous heart that drew around him a host of friends.

Fifty years ago, in the city of Philadelphia he was born, and as a poor boy he began the battle of life with all the odds against him; and few there were who knew or cared to record the story of his early struggles. A half century later he died on earth, and every proud banner in that magnificent city an honored and influential Member of the greatest lawmaking body on earth, and every proud banner in that magnificent city trailed its heroic colors at half-mast by reason of his untimely death. Splendid record of one more American citizen gone to the great beyond! Peace to his ashes! Honor to his name! Immortality to his memory!

Mr. WACHTER. Mr. Speaker, we meet to-day to do unto the memory of one who has shared with us the responsibility that goes with membership. It is but right and proper that we thus pause in our labor to attest our appreciation of the service and work of one who has been taken from our midst. GEORGE A. CASTOR, while unknown to me prior to his entrance into this body, and while my acquaintance with him was but slight, yet brief as it was it gave me a knowledge of the great respect in which he was held by his colleagues and of noble qualities that won for him the esteem and confidence of the people of his district and city. I had the great pleasure of being associated with him on one of the committees of the House, and I can attest to the fact that no other Member surpassed him in the attendance upon and performance of the work connected therewith. His life is an example of what can be accomplished by a strict application to business and faithful adherence to high and lofty principles in the conduct thereof. His success was marvelous. We have been told his beginning in life was humble; that at the age of 19 he was a tailor; that at 27 he opened a tailoring establishment in the great metropolis of New York, and that in the following year he opened another in the city of Boston; and that thereafter success soon so crowned his efforts that he opened other establishments which were equally successful; so much so, in fact, that at the early age of 32 he was able to retire from an active business career with a comfortable fortune. This record certainly gives evidence of the exceptional ability and qualifications that he must have been endowed with, and from what I have learned of him—and learned to-day—I am convinced that he was ever prompt and conscientious in the performance and discharge of all obligations by him assumed. In his composition there was no selfish greed or burning ambition to amass and hoard up riches, but he was satisfied with the success that had crowned his efforts and was content to enjoy the life that such a condition assured.

When he was elected to Congress to fill an unexpired term of his predecessor, I feel safe in saying that it can be properly assumed that his acceptance of this trust was impelled rather by the desire to serve his city and its interests than to gratify any personal or selfish ambition. It shall not be my purpose to speak of his home life or of those personal attributes that endeared him to his friends and won for him the high regard and respect with which he was esteemed, as this shall be left to those who knew him better and who were in the circle of his intimate friendship.

Those who knew him best will mourn him most, as we are justified in assuming that had his career been extended in the House it would have been such a development that it would surely have left his influence in behalf of the good people of his district and the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. But such is life; the Great Messenger has summoned to that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns; he has gone to give an account for the deeds done in the body, and as we thus pay tribute to his memory we should be reminded of the certainty of a day when each of us must humbly and surely accept the inevitable fate destined for all mankind. Let his life be an inspiration to us and his virtues be emulated. May his memory ever be green in the hearts of his colleagues and of the people who honored and loved him and that he loved so well.

[Mr. GROSVENOR addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, GEORGE A. CASTOR was born in Pennsylvania more than a half century ago, when that State had about the same population as the present State of Michigan has. He lived early enough to know of the civil war, but he was not sufficiently old to participate in that fratricidal contest. It is a rather strange coincidence that his predecessor was cut down in the prime of life at the beginning of a Congressional career. They both came up from poor men to successful financiers—one a harness maker, the other a tailor.

Mr. CASTOR was a business man rather than a politician. Yet he was an active party worker for years. He held no office except as a Member of this House. His life's history has much of the usual kind. It runs something like this: He was a poor boy—how many successful men started in the same way. He had a public school education. More men start with this foundation than any other. He was a laborer; made his bread in the sweat of his face, so similar to the starting of all great careers, whether as captains of industry or as leaders of thought and enterprise.

He was industrious and frugal, and accumulated a good estate—the story of nearly every successful business career. He became influential as a citizen because of fair dealing and a friendly spirit. He entered the political arena near the close of his life, and served with distinction in this important body. He left, surviving him, his wife and children—the beginning and ending that may be frequently written in the history of other successful lives.

Mr. CASTOR'S life is a forceful illustration of the opportunities presented the American youth and what can be made of them. There are no barriers to preferment in this great land. The road from poverty to riches, from humble life to highest station, is constantly traveled. There is ever the star of hope to encourage and the course of men to persuade the poor boy to look upward and onward. After all, however, real triumph comes as the reward of merit. The individual must earn it. In this way Mr. CASTOR won renown, and he leaves to his family a legacy in his life and deeds that is of more consequence than the fortune in material wealth they inherit.

Mr. Speaker, this short career was not in vain. Cut off before the ripened fruit of age had come, but what a consolation to family, what source of comfort to friends, what a blessing to country! What was the predominant trait? What distinguished his character? What made him the recipient of others' esteem and confidence? It was the kindly spirit, the love for mankind, the social relations which most endeared him to his fellows.

In public life he made no great display. He was not ostentatious. He was not an orator, but a practical, common-sense speaker. In Congress he was growing in usefulness. His judgment was worth considering, and his colleagues were finding it out. His worth was properly determined by what he did rather than by the assurance of greater achievements hereafter. Measured by the standard of real worth rather than by public demonstration, Mr. CASTOR made a record here that is a source of gratification to his family and an honor to the constituency he served. The deeds of greatness which stand out prominently to crown the efforts of a Congressional career are few indeed, but the overmastering element of strength after all is honesty of purpose and life, devotion to duty, and the esteem of fellows.

Mr. CASTOR possessed these characteristics. How can the value of human life be ascertained? Who can tell who are entitled to be recognized as real benefactors? Men come on the stage of action and in a few years at best pass off. Their days are numbered, and their deeds make the monument great or small which shall remind the world that they have been. Is life worth the living? Is the price not too great? There is good in every life, there is hope in every conflict, there is at least the spark of human affection in every breast. It may not be dominant, but if enkindled will brighten the hopes of others, cheer the hearts of friends, and give consolation to home and family. Into Mr. CASTOR'S life much good had come. He had endeared himself to many. He is missed. A great writer has said, "One of the best evidences of one's influence is expressed, after his demise, in the words, 'Oh, how we miss him.'"

Why should Mr. CASTOR lie cold in death? Why should a useful career in public life be cut short near its inception? Why should family ties the most sacred be severed? No mortal can explain. Our friend lived; now he is dead. May Heaven bless his ashes and friends be found to bind the broken hearts of his family, and the lesson of the uncertainty of life and the duty of meeting death be impressed upon the living, and especially the colleagues of Mr. CASTOR on this floor.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE HON. GEORGE R. PATTERSON.

Mr. SAMUEL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon GEORGE R. PATTERSON, late a Member of this House from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his distinguished public career the House, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The question was taken; and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. SAMUEL. Mr. Speaker, it was my sad duty on the 21st day of March, 1906, to announce to the House the sudden and unexpected death of the late GEORGE R. PATTERSON, a distinguished Representative from the Twelfth Congressional district of Pennsylvania for a number of years, and to state that at another time I would ask that another day be set apart for the purpose of a proper consideration of his life, character, and valuable public services. On March 27, by special order, the 15th day of April was set apart for these memorial services. On the 5th day of April, on motion of Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania, this day was selected, and we are assembled this afternoon to pay our last tribute of respect to one who was one of the most popular and energetic members of this House, who served his constituency with signal fidelity and loyalty, and who was greatly loved and respected at his home, which was shown by the great concourse of people and friends who assembled from near and from far to pay their last respects to all that was mortal of their true friend and fellow-citizen.

I shall not undertake to give an extended review of his career at this time, but will print the same in the RECORD, as part of my remarks.

MR. PATTERSON'S CAREER.

GEORGE ROBERT PATTERSON, Republican, of Ashland, was born at Lewistown, Mifflin County, Pa., November 9, 1863; attended the public schools and the academy at that place; had been engaged in mercantile pursuits since leaving school, in 1880, most of the time as a traveling salesman, first in the hardware business and for the last twelve years in flour and feed; at present is agent for a Minneapolis mill, covering territory in central Pennsylvania; has been living at Ashland since March, 1886; has always been a Republican, and has taken an active part in the politics of the district for a number of years, having frequently been a delegate to local and State conventions, and delegate to the national Republican convention at Chicago, June, 1904; was elected to the Fifty-seventh and Fifty-eighth Congresses, and reelected to the Fifty-ninth Congress, receiving 17,419 votes, to 12,005 for H. O. Haag, Democrat, 239 for W. H. Zweizig, Prohibitionist, and 679 for M. E. Doyle, Socialist, a plurality of 5,414, the largest ever given to any candidate for any office on any ticket in this district.

MR. PATTERSON'S FAMILY.

Mr. PATTERSON'S mother has been a resident of Washington for several years. His father, who was a Presbyterian minister of honorable Revolutionary ancestry, has been dead for some years. He had no brothers or sisters.

His immediate family consists of his widow, who was Mary, daughter of James R. Cleaver, of Ashland, one of the pioneer coal operators of this region, and one son and one daughter, Granville and Esther, who are about 12 and 7 years of age, respectively.

PROMINENT SOCIETY MAN.

Mr. PATTERSON was a charter member of Ashland Lodge, No. 384, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and was also a member of Sheridan Council, No. 1128, Royal Arcanum; of Washington Camp, No. 84, Patriotic Order Sons of America, and of Shenandoah Aerie, No. 129, Fraternal Order of Eagles.

MR. PATTERSON'S DEATH.

On Tuesday, March 20, 1906, Mr. PATTERSON reached Washington shortly after 9 o'clock, from his home at Ashland, Pa., and went direct to his mother's home at No. 1745 Q street NW., where he met his private secretary, Burd W. Payne. They spent a couple of hours going over the mail and talking on business matters, after which Mr. Payne went home and Mr. PATTERSON retired about midnight. He had not complained of feeling unwell beyond being tired after his long ride from Ashland. About 5 o'clock this morning his mother heard him moving around, and going to his room she found him taking a dose of medicine, he saying that he was not feeling very well. She lingered with him for a few moments and then returned to her room again. About half an hour later she heard him moaning, and she again hurried to his room and found him still in bed and bleeding profusely from the nose. Recognizing that he was seriously ill she summoned help and a physician was called, but his services were of no avail, as Mr. PATTERSON expired in a few moments.

THE FUNERAL.

The funeral of the late GEORGE R. PATTERSON, Member of Congress from the Twelfth district of Pennsylvania, was marked by a great outpouring of people, not only from his home town, but all parts of the county and many sections of the State and nation, and was a fitting tribute to the respect and esteem in which the deceased was held. People from every walk of life turned out to pay their last sad tribute of respect to the dead, and long before the hour for the services began to gather at the family home. The remains, which had been prepared for interment at Washington, D. C., where he died on Wednesday last, reclined in a handsome broadcloth-covered casket with silver-barred handles, which was covered with a wealth of beautiful flowers, and on which was a heavy plate which bore the simple inscription:

GEORGE ROBERT PATTERSON.
March 21, 1906.

The services, which were conducted at the house, No. 119 Center street, began at 1.30 o'clock and were very brief and simple in their character. Rev. Francis S. Hort, the pastor of the Presbyterian Church at South Bethlehem, Pa., and formerly of Ashland, was the officiating minister, and the services consisted of prayer, an appropriate scriptural reading, and a short discourse. The only music was a simple hymn, entitled "Some Sweet Day," by Towne, which was sung very beautifully and sympathetically by Mrs. Robert D. Heaton and Miss Ida Price, of the Presbyterian Church choir. In his discourse Reverend Hort drew a strong moral lesson from the mysteries of death and found much consoling thought for the sorrowing family. He also paid tribute to the memory of the deceased, and throughout the discourse was full of rich, soulful thought and taught the lesson of preparation for the life to come. Many wept silently during the sad service.

THE FLORAL DECORATIONS.

The floral decorations were most beautiful and profuse, and included offerings from Shenandoah Aerie, No. 103, Fraternal Order of Eagles; Ashland Lodge, No. 384, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks; Lewistown Lodge, No. 663, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks; Mr. and Mrs. D. M. Graham, Mahanoy City; Paul W. Houck, Shenandoah; J. B. Howell, Girardville; Mrs. Harry Freeman Clark, Mrs. Emma C. Clark, Harry Ellis, William Pedlow, Crawford Bennie, Captain and Mrs. Foote, Mrs. Mitchell, and Mrs. Tyson, Washington, D. C.; James A. McCarthy, Locust Gap; Hon. Wayne Parker, New Jersey; Miss Mary C. Weir, Wilkes-Barre; William Renn, William Egbert, Lewistown, Pa.; Burd Linder, Orwigsburg; S. Burd Edwards, Pottsville; Mr. and Mrs. Harry Hunter, Mr. and Mrs William S. Leib, William Berrang, Ashland, and many others. The floral offerings from the family and from the pallbearers were also profuse and beautiful.

Other floral tributes that came later were from "His Tamaqua Friends;" Miss Annie Eckert, Lewistown, and O. Blanchard, Washington, D. C.

The Congressional party also brought with them several beautiful floral tributes, the whole constituting the most elaborate floral display ever seen in Ashland.

THE CONGRESSIONAL DELEGATION.

The committee appointed by Congress to attend the obsequies embraced some of the most prominent men in public life, including Senators PHILANDER C. KNOX, of Pittsburg, Pa.; BOIES PENROSE, Philadelphia, Pa.; J. FRANK ALLEE, Dover Del.; NATHAN B. SCOTT, Wheeling, W. Va.; AUGUSTUS O. BACON, Macon, Ga.; FRED T. DUBOIS, Blackfoot, Idaho; and the following Members of the House of Representatives, colleagues of Mr. PATTERSON: Dr. EDMUND W. SAMUEL, Mount Carmel, Pa.; ANDREW J. BARCHFELD, Pittsburg, Pa.; MIAL E. LILLEY, Towanda, Pa.; GUSTAV A. SCHNEEBELI, Nazareth, Pa.; THOMAS S. BUTLER, West Chester, Pa.; MARCUS C. L. KLINE, Allentown, Pa.; HENRY C. LOUDENSLAGER, Paulsboro, N. J.; DAVID J. FOSTER, Burlington, Vt.; ROBERT F. BROUSSARD, New Iberia, La.; GEORGE W. PRINCE, Galesburg, Ill.; JOSEPH A. GOULDEN, Fordham, N. Y.; WYATT AIKEN, Abbeville, S. C.; and GILBERT B. PATTERSON, Maxton, N. C.

The party came from Washington on a special train over the Pennsylvania Railroad to Pottsville, where they were transferred to the Reading, reaching Ashland at 12.06 o'clock. They took dinner on the train, and afterwards proceeded to the house, but did not go to the cemetery, which is a rule on such occasions, so that their stay in Ashland was a brief one.

The only Senator to arrive was Senator BOIES PENROSE.

Of the Congressional party, SYLVESTER C. SMITH, of Bakersfield, Cal., was substituted for BUTLER, of West Chester; W. H. ANDREWS, of Albuquerque, N. Mex.; J. C. NEEDHAM, of Modesta, Cal., substituted for AIKEN, of South Carolina.

Ex-Congressman C. H. Dickerman, of Milton, and Dr. H. R. BURTON, of Lewes, Del., were with the party, as were also J. B. Roberts, of Sioux Falls, S. Dak., clerk for the Senate Committee on Pensions; Ralph Paxton, of Medicine Lodge, Kans., clerk for the Senate Committee on Census; Frank H. Barto, clerk for the House Committee on Pensions, of which Mr. PATTERSON was a member; J. S. Rogers, of Philadelphia, clerk in the file department; and Frank Samuel, of Mount Carmel, private secretary to his father, Congressman E. W. SAMUEL.

The party was in charge of Sergeant-at-Arms of the House Henry Casson, of Wisconsin, and his assistants, J. F. English, of California, and C. E. Morley, of Wisconsin.

The Twelfth Congressional district of Pennsylvania had no more popular and respected citizen than GEORGE R. PATTERSON.

His long residence there had made him known to all the people. He was the kind of a man whom people liked. His good nature was spontaneous and always put those about him in good humor. He was ever bright and cheerful, and gloom never had a part in his composition. He always had a good story and he knew how to tell it. And he was always a gentleman, ever courteous and agreeable. Kindness was one of his most marked traits. It was never too much trouble for him to do a favor for a friend, and no one will ever know of his innumerable acts of kindness, both in his political and private life. Wherever he was he was the life of the party. His goodness of heart and mind fully covered any fault, if there was any fault in him. GEORGE R. PATTERSON was a clean man. There was no blot or stain on his character, private or public. And now he is dead, cut down in the heydey of his usefulness.

Close the book; the story of a life is ended. It is only to remember.

The body of GEORGE ROBERT PATTERSON now lies peacefully at rest beneath the sod of a sun-kissed slope, clothed, as it is to-day, in a mantle of glistening white laid by nature and which reflects the purity of that beautiful city whose gates of pearl have opened wide to bid him welcome home, and where St. Paul tells us—

It doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is.

GEORGE ROBERT PATTERSON has solved the mystery of the future. We must wait to know what that means through our own experience. But such is the destiny of our departed friend, and it is ground for rejoicing amid our sorrow to-day. That he made errors is possible, for who, indeed, is exempt from that frailty? But if he did, he was like all the rest of his fellowmen. He had, however, strong virtues of head and heart. Strong convictions of principle and duty were conspicuous in his life. He never claimed perfection, but time, in sculpturing his character, produced one which merits a high meed of praise. It is only after men pass to "that bourne from whence no traveler returns" that a dispassionate, broad view is taken of their life and career. It is a great pleasure to-day to hear the candid and sincere praise bestowed upon our departed friend, even by those who sometimes differed with his judgment and convictions. He always fought a fair fight in the battle of life. It is not a difficult task to speak of him on this occasion, but he deserves a better eulogium than the writer is able to pronounce. We can comfort ourselves, however, with the fact that his life and character speak forcefully and eloquently for him. Death has made more vivid that which we felt was strong and symmetrical in him. It throws sunlight in among the shadows, so that we now appreciate him the more thoroughly.

His death falls with the heaviest severity upon his widow and two children. To them can only come now the memory of his devotion, his affection, his duty as a husband and a father, which must ever live as a sweet and never-dying fragrance. May this memory mitigate their grief and bring comfort to their hearts, now borne down by a great weight of sorrow.

Mr. KLINE. Mr. Speaker, I had not designed to take any part in these proceedings, but upon reflection I have thought that by reason of the contiguity of the respective districts represented by the deceased and myself it was due to the memory of the gentleman who has so recently and unexpectedly died that I should make a few observations.

I had no acquaintance with GEORGE R. PATTERSON, who formerly represented the Twelfth Congressional district of Pennsylvania, known as the "Schuylkill district," until a considerable period after my election to the Fifty-eighth Congress. The intercourse I had with him from and after my first introduction in Congress and outside of these walls was of a most agreeable and delightful character. In coming to and returning from Washington I frequently met him on the train, and found him to be a frank, hospitable, happy, and open-hearted gentleman. I found him to be a good companion, genial and of high and fascinating social qualities.

His sudden and unexpected demise was a surprise and shock to every Member of this House, and the great esteem in which he was held was evidenced by an adjournment immediately after the reading of the Journal and announcement of his death. To know him was to love him.

Chosen to fill the honorable public position as a Representative in Congress for three consecutive terms, which he held at the time of his decease, he continued to discharge the obligations imposed with firmness and fidelity to the last, ever enjoying the confidence, esteem, and affection of his constituency.

He represented a district in the heart of the anthracite coal region. His constituency represented numerous nationalities, engaged in numerous and diversified kinds of trade, occupation, and business, and by reason thereof the political sentiment of his people had been for many years of a fluctuating character. Whilst a large majority of the county officers in his district, including the judges of the several courts, are now and have been filled by men of Democratic faith, the popularity and esteem of the deceased was so great and manifest that he was for three consecutive terms elected over his Democratic competitors by increasing majorities.

His death was mourned by a large circle of friends, as was evidenced by the large number in attendance at his funeral, coming from all stations in life and from all parts of his district, in friendship's tribute to the memory of their deceased friend, neighbor, and Representative. Had you been in attendance at his funeral, in his home town of Ashland, in a mining locality, and witnessed the throng of thousands of his friends, neighbors, and those bound by fraternal union, who came from far and near to pay the last mark of respect to their deceased Representative; had you observed the profound impression which the recollection of his life and many good traits and virtues left upon an entire community, you would have concluded that there was something to live for beyond the attainment of political position. You would have realized that it is not all of life to live, nor all of death to die.

The deceased was engaged in business before his entrance in public life and election to Congress. He did not make any pretense of oratory, leadership, or statesmanship. He was faithful and diligent in committee work, conscientious and active in the performance of the work assigned to him. He was always ready to help a friend or colleague if it was right and consistent and the request was just and reasonable. He would never consent to become compromised or commit an act of which he couldn't approve at the time or ratify in the future. Neither the railings of a partisan press nor the taunts of political opponents could swerve or deter him from the performance of such official duty as conscience told him he ought to do, nor could such influences compel him to the performance of what conscience taught him ought not to be done. He was a man of most kind and generous impulses, firmly and warmly attached to his family, friends, and acquaintances; he was not vindicative, and these qualities combined to render him a most faithful Representative.

It is true, as was said by a gentleman on the floor of this House a few days ago, that "experience teaches us that the most effective work is done, not upon the floor of the House by the perpetual talkers, but by the quiet, active, and earnest Members who attend strictly to their committee work and give their thought and time to such legislation as properly comes before the committees to which they are assigned." Such a Member was the deceased. He was not a perpetual talker in the House, but did his most effective work in the committee room and in attending faithfully and promptly to the demands and requests of his constituents. In this manner he gained his popularity amongst the membership of the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it has frequently, through the later series of years, occurred to my mind that the man who is acknowledged by the community in which he lives to be an upright, conscientious, liberal, and honest man, enjoys the best reputation that a man can have. A man who has qualifications and ability may connect himself with public life; he may come into your legislative halls and establish a reputation as an orator or a statesman; he may pursue some literary calling; he may win a reputation that is coextensive with the world; but after all, when you come to form your estimate of the man, you must rely upon the character that he has established about his own threshold, at his own hearth, in his own family, and among his own neighbors. There is the standard by which we must measure a man after all is said and done. That is the corner stone of his building; that is the groundwork of his fame, let it be what it may, and no fame is worth having that is not based upon a reputation for social and moral virtues in the community where it is the man's destiny to live and perhaps his destiny to die. In his home, in his own community, amongst his neighbors and friends, GEORGE R. PATTERSON acquired and enjoyed his first fame and great popularity. There the foundations were laid for his entrance into public life, where he equally acquired and enjoyed the confidence and good will of all who knew him. He was strong and robust, active, busy, and energetic in life, but, like all who have preceded him, he, too, was mortal.

We who survive the deceased and who for a brief hour continue to strut upon this our public stage find it hard to stop and think, to realize that we, too, are mortal, and that our hearts—

> Like muffled drums, are beating
> Funeral marches to the grave.

It is but a bubble we are blowing. No matter how largely we swell in our conceit, how magnificent we expand our proportions, the bubble will finally burst for us, as it has done in the case of our illustrious predecessors, and we shall return to the obscurity from which we came, unhonored and unsung. And even if we succeed in securing public attention for more than one or two or three or more terms of our Congressional life, by a most persistent effort or efforts in blowing our bubble, others will soon crowd us off the scene of action and strut their brief hour of fancied greatness and renown.

> This is the state of man: to-day he puts forth
> The tender leaves of hopes; to-morrow blossoms,
> And bears his blushing honors thick upon him;
> The third day comes a frost, a killing frost,
> And when he thinks, good easy man, full surely
> His greatness is a-ripening, nips his root.

My object has been accomplished if I have succeeded in arresting the attention of my fellow-Members by this brief contemplation of the life and death of our late friend and colleague. Let us emulate his good qualities and realize that it is not all of life to reach public station, nor all of duty to distinguish oneself in the fitful notoriety of the passing hour.

Mr. HOGG. Mr. Speaker, our friend and colleague, GEORGE PATTERSON, has passed out of the shadows. Suddenly he stepped aside, and we know him no more forever.

Had our will been done he would have eased his burden down with feeble, trembling hands, and his last steps would have been taken falteringly. We would have given him the serenity and peace of old age at the end. It is so we judge of things.

He came from the field at noontime, and did not return to his task. The plow was left in the furrow when the darkness came.

I have seen the aged die, and it seemed well, for they were tired and worn; their day had been long and wearisome; they had wrought much and well, and the night and rest became the benediction of an infinite goodness.

With our friend it was otherwise, and he left his work unfinished, as we would measure it.

I had not known him long, but I knew him well, all that was worth knowing, the soul of him, and admired him much. Our view of him was not obscured, for it was a pleasing landscape, with the sunshine resting on it.

His nature was so open, generous, and manly that we instinctively gave him our tribute of sincerest friendship.

We shall strike no balance of his life, for friendship strikes no balances and carries no account against the dead.

Honest, just, and generous, with a great heart overflowing with warm human sympathy, GEORGE PATTERSON left the only fortune worth while, the memory of his kindliness. And so "it is well with the lad." It is not for us to speculate about that unknown country to which he has journeyed, for no word has ever come to the anxious, eager ears of hope and love. If it is well that there be a far country, it is—if not, it is still well. Resting in the security of infinite wisdom we shall be content. Our friend has gone his way alone, as we must all go, and there was no fear. To him we might have said with Aurelius: "Thou hast embarked, thou hast finished thy voyage, thou art come to shore. Get out."

Rest to his generous, lovable, manly soul. "The eternal years of God are his."

Mr. Speaker, he was my friend; I loved him; I would that he might come back from the land of silence.

Mr. DALE. Mr. Speaker, the birthplace of GEORGE ROBERT PATTERSON was Lewiston, Mifflin County, Pa. Born and reared amid the rugged and beautiful hills of Pennsylvania, the love for these hills was dominant and controlling throughout his life. I am inclined to believe that no person thus born and reared can ever forget these hills. No matter where he roams, no matter where necessity or duty places him, the call to the hills will ever and always follow him. The love for his native hills seems to enter into the very web and woof of his being. It is resistless; it is compelling; he can not get away from it; he can not dismiss it. Sometimes I think Samuel Francis Smith must have known and loved the wooded hills of Pennsylvania when he penned the words:

> I love thy rocks and rills,
> Thy woods and templed hills.

I know how intensely GEORGE R. PATTERSON longed for these hills; and so it is eminently fitting and altogether proper that all that is earthly of our honored friend should find its final resting place in the beautiful cemetery at Ashland, under the shadow of the mighty hills he so much loved.

Mr. Speaker, I understand that to other speakers has been assigned the privilege of reviewing in detail the life and work of GEORGE R. PATTERSON, but I can not let this occasion pass without noting one of his marked characteristics. I refer to his kindly spirit and gentle courtesy to the new Member. I remember when I came here he was one of the first to greet me and to offer his services to aid and help me. Over and over again his time, his wise counsel, and the benefit of his large experience have been freely and cheerfully given to myself and to other new Members. For his friends, no task was too heavy for him to attempt, no work too onerous for him to perform, no favor too great for his generous heart to grant. Surely his unselfish devotion to others, his ready willingness to sacrifice his own time and his own pleasure in the interest of others, entitled him to wear the princely motto, "Ich dien"—"I serve."

Mr. Speaker, directly in front of my place in this House there is a vacant seat. GEORGE R. PATTERSON has departed; his labors have ceased; his work has ended.

> The body may lie in moldering chancel or in crumbling vault, but the rumor of a noble life, the record of valor and truth, can never die, but lives on in the soul of the people.

An English author recently wrote these words:

> The years pass, the old wheel turns, and ever the thread runs out. The wise and the good, the noble and the brave, they come from the darkness and into the darkness they go, whence, whither, and why, who can say?

It appears to me the sentiment thus expressed is altogether too pessimistic. I boldly assert in our day and time it is more and more true that ever through the darkness breaks a ray of light, bringing hope and confidence that in the end "there shall be no more darkness."

That hope-giving light streams through the riven door of the new-made sepulchre of Joseph of Arimathea and rests upon the head of Him whose resurrection brought cheer and hope and life to hopeless humanity. "Though he were dead, yet shall he live."

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to add a word to the splendid tributes that have been paid to the memory of the late Hon. GEORGE ROBERT PATTERSON, whose death brought sorrow to his colleagues here and to the thousands who mourn his loss at home.

The spirit prompting me is not that of one who, in recounting the deeds of great men, is flattered by the reflected halo of their recital. I am no Boswell nor was the deceased a Johnson. My humble tribute is a simple response to that geniality and sincerity of heart, so marked in the deceased, which, unhampered by formalism, went direct to the hearts of his associates. It is of this one phase of his character that I desire to speak.

There are triumphs of eloquence and triumphs of organization, but that which elected our friend a Member of this body was the triumph of a warm and genial heart, coupled with that strong common sense and insight into human nature which traveling salesmen possess perhaps more than all other men. These, too, were the qualities which made him one of the most watchful and useful Members of the House.

However much some may discount membership in this body, it is a distinction, and may I add, without egotism, that its attainment is strong presumptive evidence of ability, possibly latent, but no less certain. It is a distinction that many of the ablest lawyers throughout this land have thought it not improper to strive for. Disguise it as some may, the confidence of a majority of your home people in electing you to a position of such responsibility could find lack of appreciation only in an ungrateful heart.

The deceased came not from the ranks of the professional class, so overwhelmingly represented in Congress, but he came from the people, elevated from amongst them, with the glow of popular demands fresh upon his mind and with a sympathy of interest that the formalism of professional life would almost make impossible. In this day of action rather than words, even in the American Congress his usefulness may not be discounted by the most profound constitutional lawyer of this body. Legislation is as much the result of the hand touch of the committee as the hair splitting of the forum.

We recognize the general proposition that education gives its possessor an advantage over illiteracy, and professional education tends to emphasize that advantage. But he who, with a simple English education, in a body largely dominated by professional men can set at naught legal quibblings and fully maintain the rights of his constituents must possess those qualities of mind less lustrous, but no less valuable, in the attainment of results than polished oratory. Such were the qualities of mind and heart with which our friend was endowed. Genial always, he was aggressive, yet unobtrusive; quiet, yet ever alert and untiring in the discharge of his duty to his constituents; a strict party man in so far as that obligation bound in reason, yet tolerant and reasonable in his dealings with the opposition.

Hailing from widely divergent sections of the United States, representing interests that have little similarity, with an acquaintance of only a few years, there was no tie, save such as the Creator had implanted in that generous heart, to bring me within the number of those who sorrow for his "taking away." "In the world's broad field of battle" these influences linked to him, here and there, the fellowship and sympathy of his associates, and though in "crossing the bar" into the great unknown ocean his temporal life fades from our view, we follow him with those feelings which can not die.

The brevity and uncertainty of life is strikingly illustrated in the passing away of this young man who seemed to be in the springtime of his career. Little more than two years ago he was one of the party which bore the remains of the late Hon. George W. Croft to his native State (South Carolina), to place them amongst those who sleep. While the memory of this event is as of yesterday, the summons comes again; passing over those who have long heard the breakers on a not distant shore, it knocked at the heart of our young friend, and it was still. Perhaps it is best that we do not know when we stand near the shadow.

In the vigor of young manhood, unbroken by the weight of years, he laid down life in its flower. If the contention of the psychologist is true, that thought is not even suspended in passing from this to the higher life, may we not hope that beyond the dividing line this life, pruned of earthly hindrances and transplanted in a more congenial soil, may go on in the enlarged exercise of those virtues that characterized it here?

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, in the fourth volume of his War and Peace Tolstoy likens life to an immense living globe, the surface of which is covered with drops closely crowded together, constantly pushing and pressing against each other, some expanding, others fusing or coalescing. In the center of the globe is God, and ever and anon, as some of these drops are crushed out of existence, their substance sinks back into the depths, while others expand to enormous size before being undermined or annihilated. Although not calculated to create any false impressions or charm us by the ideality of its conception, yet it is a very striking picture of mankind.

Its truth is brought very forcibly to mind when we consider the life and services of Mr. GEORGE ROBERT PATTERSON, who has represented his district in three successive Congresses. A Pennsylvanian by birth, he was thoroughly American in education and training, a product of that school system which is so distinctive a mark of our civilization. If in these days it be a reproach to be rich, then he was free from taint, for the worldly goods he possessed were obtained by hard work, by a strict attention to duty, and by honesty and fair dealing. He was a typical American business man, and was a valiant soldier in the ranks of that army which has won such creditable victories for American prosperity.

That he was respected by his friends and neighbors is attested by their selection of him to represent them in party councils and the nation's legislative halls; and as it is safe to say that the most reliable testimony to any man's worth is that of the people who live closest to him, then he needs no greater eulogy than the record of his three successive elections to Congress, the last by the greatest majority ever given to a candidate for any office in the district.

As he was only 43 at his death, he had reached but the prime of life. He had arrived at the stage when his knowledge and experience would have been of the greatest good to his constituents and fellow-citizens. He had been long enough in Congress to have thoroughly mastered its traditions, its intricate machinery, and its possibilities, and was therefore in a fair way to become one of its leaders and a credit to his State and the nation.

He was constantly growing in power and influence, but he did not exercise it in the Machiavellian fashion, which is characteristic of much of our party politics, but used it in the simple, old-fashioned, American way which endeared so many of our elder statesmen to the hearts of their followers. He was indeed like a drop on Tolstoy's globe, expanding into noble proportions, becoming a beautiful sight to all beholders. But death came to undermine him, and in a twinkling he was crushed out to sink back into the bosom of his Maker.

It is always unwise to push an analogy too far, and we can not therefore pursue the fatalism of the great Russian to its bitter end; although it would be wrong to close our eyes to the fact that in the reality of life there are no gaps, and our places are soon filled. Perhaps this is the sternest lesson which the philosophy of history has to teach us. But, in reviewing the career of our late colleague, we find that his passing does leave an aching void; at one stroke a son, a husband, and a father has been cut down, and a stanch friend and ally has been taken from his coworkers and constituents. But as he will be enshrined in the hearts and memory of all who knew him, he will thus, in all truth, continue to fill his own place.

And to the members of his bereaved family, consolation should be contained in those words of Landor, "He whom God smiteth, hath God with him."

It was my privilege to join with his late associates in attending his funeral at his home in Ashland, Pa. The appropriate services, simple, but impressive in character, were typical of the life of the late GEORGE ROBERT PATTERSON. The immense throng of sad faces that had gathered, with the closed places of business, all bore testimony to the esteem and regard in which he was held.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the resolution already adopted, the House stands adjourned until to-morrow, at 12 o'clock.

Accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

SUSPENSION OF DUTY ON MATERIAL FOR CALIFORNIA BUILDINGS.

Mr. CULLOM. I introduce a joint resolution, and ask that it be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The joint resolution (S. R. 50) providing for the suspension for one year of the duty on structural steel for buildings for use in cities in California, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas in view of the fact there is a shortage in structural steel and other building material in this country to meet the needs of the people of San Francisco and other California cities destroyed or damaged by earthquake shocks on April 19 and conflagration that followed, and that everything should be done to facilitate the reconstruction of the stricken cities: Therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the duty on structural steel and other necessary material intended for use in buildings to be constructed in said cities be, and it is hereby, declared to be suspended for the period of one year.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

AMENDMENT TO GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ELKINS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $600 to pay J. F. Sellers, S. A. Maryman, and F. L. Thompson $200 each for extra services rendered to the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate during the consideration of the hearings on the regulation of railway rates, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. ALICE VIRGINIA HOLLIS.

Mr. ELKINS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Alice Virginia Hollis, widow of C. R. Hollis, late assistant engineer under the Superintendent of the Capitol, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his demise, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

SEYMOUR HOWELL.

Mr. BURROWS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the chief justice and the judges of the Court of Claims be, and are hereby, requested to return to the Senate the papers in the case of Seymour Howell.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS IN CALIFORNIA.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 141) for the further relief of sufferers from earthquake and conflagration on the Pacific coast was read the first time by its title.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations this morning considered the joint resolution, having a copy of it in advance of its being formally sent to the Senate. I ask that it may be immediately considered.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was read the second time at length, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 1, line 9, after the word "million" and before the word "dollars," I move to insert the words "five hundred thousand;" so as to read "the sum of one million five hundred thousand dollars."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I also move to add at the end of the joint resolution a semicolon and the following words:

And for the purpose of defraying all extra cost to the War Department incurred in mileage of officers, transportation of troops, and all other expenditures which would not have been necessary but for the relief measures herein described and authorized.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest to the Senator from Iowa that after the words "two million," in line 2, on the top of page 2, the words "five hundred thousand" should be inserted.

Mr. ALLISON. The words "five hundred thousand" should be added there.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The additional amendment will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 2, after the words "two million" and before the word "dollars," insert "five hundred thousand."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

The joint resolution as passed reads as follows:

Resolved, etc., That for the further relief of sufferers from earthquake and conflagration on the Pacific coast, as provided in the joint resolution approved April 19, 1906, as amended by the joint resolution approved April 20, 1906, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary; and authority is hereby specifically given to the Secretary of War to use this sum and the former appropriation for this purpose, amounting in all to $2,500,000, not only to buy additional supplies which may be needed for the relief of the sufferers as directed in said resolutions of April 19 and April 20, but also for the purpose of replacing by purchase such subsistence, quartermaster's, and medical supplies which may have been furnished by the Secretary of War for such relief from the stores on hand for the use of the Army; and for the purpose of defraying all extra cost to the War Department incurred in mileage of officers, transportation of troops, and all other expenditures which would not have been necessary but for the relief measures herein described and authorized.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 11037. An act relating to the transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

H. R. 18198. An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS IN CALIFORNIA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. PERKINS, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I submit herewith a letter of the Secretary of War, with accompanying documents, including a form of a resolution suggested for passage by the Congress.

This letter refers to the appalling catastrophe which has befallen San Francisco and neighboring cities, a catastrophe more appalling than any other of the kind that has befallen any portion of our country during its history. I am sure that there is need on my part of no more than a suggestion to the Congress in order that this resolution may be at once passed. But I urge that instead of appropriating a further sum of $1,000,000 as recommended by the Secretary of War, the appropriation be for a million and a half dollars. The supplies already delivered or en route for San Francisco approximate in value a million and a half dollars, which is more than we have had the authority in law as yet to purchase. I do not think it safe for us to reckon upon the need of spending less than a million in addition. Large sums are being raised by private subscription in this country, and very generous offers have been made to assist us by individuals of other countries, which requests, however, I have refused, as in my judgment there is no need of any assistance from outside our own borders—this refusal of course in no way lessening our deep appreciation of the kindly sympathy which has prompted such offers.

The detailed account of the action of the War Department is contained in the appendixes to the letter of the Secretary of War. At the moment our concern is purely with meeting the terrible emergency of the moment. Later I shall communicate with you as to the generous part which I am sure the National Government will take in meeting the more permanent needs of the situation, including of course rebuilding the great governmental structures which have been destroyed.

I hope that the action above requested can be taken to-day.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 21, 1906.

COMMUTATION FOR GOOD CONDUCT OF PRISONERS.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Calendar the bill (H. R. 15910) to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate commutation for good conduct for United States prisoners," approved June 21, 1902. It will not take any time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection the Senate, as in the Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to amend section 3 of the act entitled "An act to regulate commutation for good conduct for United States prisoners," approved June 21, 1902, so as to read:

SEC. 3. That this act shall apply to all sentences imposed subsequent to July 21, 1902, and to the sentences imposed prior thereto the commutation upon which is less than that provided in this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEASES IN THE YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

The bill (S. 4433) to amend an act approved August 3, 1894, entitled "An act concerning leases in the Yellowstone National Park," was announced as first in order on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill was heretofore passed, and the votes by which it was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time and passed were reconsidered. The Chair understands that the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] stated when the bill was last before the Senate that he would desire to propose an amendment to the bill. The junior Senator from Idaho is not in his seat.

Mr. KEAN. I ask that the bill may go over, retaining its place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from New Jersey, the bill will go over without prejudice.

APPALACHIAN AND WHITE MOUNTAINS FOREST RESERVES.

The bill (S. 4953) for the purpose of acquiring national forest reserves in the Appalachian Mountains and White Mountains, to be known as the Appalachian Forest Reserve and the White Mountain Reserve, respectively, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. TELLER. Let the bill go over under Rule IX.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go to the Calendar under Rule IX, at the request of the Senator from Colorado.

DAMS IN ROCK ISLAND COUNTY, ILL.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 14508.

Mr. HALE. The morning business has been concluded?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed and the Senate is proceeding with the consideration of the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. HALE. The Senate is now on the Calendar?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate is now on the Calendar. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, the title of which the Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 14508) permitting the building of dams across the north and south branches of Rock River, adjacent to Vandruffs Island and Carrs Island, and across the cut-off between said islands, in Rock Island County, Ill., in aid of navigation and for the development of water power.

Mr. HALE. I will not object to this bill, but after it is disposed of, I shall ask that the regular order be enforced and that we proceed with bills on the Calendar as we reach them.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill indicated by him. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, on page 4, line 21, at the end of section 1, after the words "Carrs Island," to insert a colon and the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, if in his judgment the interests of the United States will not be injured thereby, to permit the dam across the south branch of Rock River to be located and built on land belonging to the United States, under and subject to such terms and conditions as he may consider just and reasonable.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CORPS OF DENTAL SURGEONS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. PETTUS. I make a motion to take up for present consideration, temporarily laying aside the unfinished business during the morning hour, the bill (S. 2355) to reorganize the corps of dental surgeons attached to the Medical Department of the Army. The bill was once passed. It has been called up frequently.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. On February 5 last the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, read three times, and passed, and the votes on its third reading and passage were reconsidered. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Alabama to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 18, noes none.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The division discloses the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich	Clay	Gallinger	Nelson
Alger	Culberson	Hale	Newlands
Allison	Cullom	Hansbrough	Overman
Bacon	Dick	Hemenway	Perkins
Blackburn	Dillingham	Hopkins	Pettus
Brandegee	Dolliver	Kean	Piles
Bulkeley	Dryden	Kittredge	Rayner
Burkett	Dubois	Knox	Smoot
Burnham	Elkins	Lodge	Sutherland
Burrows	Foraker	McCumber	Taliaferro
Carter	Foster	Mallory	Teller
Clapp	Frazier	Martin	Tillman
Clark, Mont.	Frye	Money	Wetmore
Clark, Wyo.	Fulton	Morgan

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The previous division disclosed the absence of a quorum. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Alabama to proceed to the consideration of the bill, on which a division has been called for.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, may I be allowed to make some remarks on this question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that debate is not in order pending the motion, except by unanimous consent.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 39, noes 7; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, this is a bill which was passed by the Senate on February 5. The next day the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], so soon as the Senate was called to order, after prayers, asked unanimous consent for a reconsideration of the vote by which this bill and another bill had been passed, and it was done by unanimous consent. Since then various efforts have been made to have the bill taken up, but they have been always objected to by the Senator from Maine. It is a bill in which I have no personal interest in the world. It is a bill of the War Department. It simply confers official rank on the class of learned men who are now employed as dentists in the Army, and gives them very limited rank, the highest being that of major. Bills on this line have been approved by every Surgeon-General for the last eight years, and this bill is approved by the present Surgeon-General.

Mr. President, this Senate has treated me so kindly since I have been here—every member of it—including the Senator from Maine—that I have been really astonished at the manner in which I have been treated in reference to this bill. Every possible means has been taken during my absence—which was a matter of absolute necessity—to delay consideration, and even when the last call was made and the bill came up regularly on the Calendar, the Senator from Maine, though asked by a member of the Committee on Military Affairs to allow the bill to retain its place on the Calendar, refused to do so.

I have been amazed at the treatment I have thus received from the Senator from Maine. He has always heretofore been courteous to me—I am glad to acknowledge that—but in this particular instance he understands his own rights with a great deal of accuracy. I fear, however, he does not always consider sufficiently the rights of other people.

The bill, as I say, proposes to give rank to dental surgeons of the Army. It has been previously discussed, and I now simply desire a vote upon it.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I shall have no controversy with the venerable and distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS], for whom I have the highest respect and regard. He has made himself in his service here agreeable in every way to Senators, and there is nothing but the kindliest feeling toward him felt by this great body. I share fully in the fact that this is the case, and that it is this feeling in regard to him and his desire to have this bill, which he has so much at heart, passed, which will carry the bill through. I do not think that on great measures, important measures, involving new legislation the Senate ought commonly to pass bills out of regard to the members of the body who desire to have them passed; but I can see plainly enough that as to this bill, in which the Senator has taken so much interest, the feeling that he is a good legislator, that he is patriotic, and that he is thoroughly in earnest about the bill, will carry it through.

I have not done anything—I am sorry the Senator thinks that I have—to unduly prejudice the bill. I think I have been bright enough to see from the beginning that the bill would go through. I think the Senator from Alabama, if he will look at the RECORD the other day when the bill went to the Calendar under Rule IX at my suggestion, will see that a half dozen of us, when measures came up that would involve contest, asked that the different bills be put on the Calendar under Rule IX. I did the same as to this bill; but I never expected that would stop the bill. This morning I could have stopped it for the time being, but I had no desire to do so. The Senator, I think, will see, he being the person who feels the responsibility of the bill, that I do not want to hold him obliged to be constantly on the lookout to try to get his bill up. While I am not in any way hopeful of defeating the bill, I do not think it ought to pass. I shall not vote for it. I do not think it is needed. Others think differently about it. The Senator, as I said, will get his bill through.

I had a little experience in the early part of this session in trying to stop another bill referring to the medical branch of the Army, and I got no votes. I was good-natured about it and took my discipline and medicine, as I shall now. I ran up against not only the committee but against the whole medical profession in the United States.

Doctor Reed, chairman of the committee on legislation appointed by the American Medical Association, stated that copies of the pending bill had been sent into each of the 3,160 counties in the United States with instructions to the receiver to obtain expressions of opinion thereon from leading physicians, medical societies, and prominent citizens. Replies strongly favoring the measure were received from more than 2,300 counties.

The doctors in the different counties properly enough took an interest in the matter and wrote to their Representatives and Senators. I was beaten, and badly beaten. Since then—it is not the fault of the Senator from Alabama—on this matter the dentists have been getting in their work, and I have letters, as other Senators have, from members of the profession in my State, men whom I regard very highly, writing to me and imploring me to vote for the bill the Senator from Alabama has in charge. That I can not do, because it is an innovation. I have just received a dispatch from the Surgeon-General of the Navy, who says there is no dental corps in the army or navy either of Great Britain, France, or Germany. It is, as I said about the other bill, a movement to increase the Army. I do not think this a good time to increase the Army. I said so then, but that was unavailing, as I realize that all I could do now would be unavailing. Some day the country will see, the Senator will see, and the other House will see that this is not a good time to increase the military establishment of the United States by bills providing for military rank which does not exist in other nations. I do not think that time has come now.

I want to say to the Senator from Alabama that I regret very much his feeling that I have sought in any way to interfere with his bill. When I am opposed to a bill I try to make my attitude plain here and vote against it. But I never supposed that this bill could be stopped; I do not suppose so now, and I think in advance I may congratulate the Senator from Alabama that he has got the Senate at his back, and if I stood here and argued during the day, as I did on the other bill, I should not get many votes. So I am not inclined to take any more time or to stand any further in the way of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am not opposed to this bill; in fact, I have the honor to be a member of the committee which reported it; but I think it requires an amendment in section 4, to which I understand the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] has no objection. It seems to me to be very essential. Section 4 provides for the organization of a board of three examiners to conduct the examinations prescribed. I move, in section 4, page 3, line 6, after the word "prescribed," to strike out down to and including the word "examiner," in line 10, and insert "one of whom shall be a surgeon in the Army, and two of whom."

Mr. PETTUS. I have no objection to that amendment, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, on page 4, line 6, after the word "prescribed," it is proposed to strike out "two of whom shall be civilians whose qualifications are certified by the executive council of the National Dental Association and whose proper compensation shall be determined by the Surgeon-General; and the third examiner," and insert "one of whom shall be a surgeon in the Army, and two of whom."

Mr. HALE. I ask that the Secretary state just how the text will read if amended as proposed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the section as it will stand if the amendment shall be agreed to.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Surgeon-General of the Army is hereby authorized to organize a board of three examiners to conduct the professional examinations herein prescribed, one of whom shall be a surgeon in the Army, and two of whom shall be selected by the Surgeon-General from the contract dental surgeons eligible under the provisions of this act to appointment to the dental corps.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I think that is an improvement on the bill. It is a very fitting and proper amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the opponents of the regulation of railway rates and services have skillfully conducted this debate almost from the beginning upon constitutional grounds. This has prevented the Senate from giving consideration to the provisions of the bill and the abuses which call for correction.

For many days the discussion has been confined to a consideration of the court procedure to test the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The importance of this branch of the subject will depend entirely upon the character of the orders which the Commission is authorized to make. The importance of any order issued will depend upon the power conferred and the duties imposed by law upon the Commission. The authority of the Commission may be so limited that the procedure for the enforcement of its orders will be relatively of little public importance.

The scope of the bill will determine the importance of all orders and all court review. For these reasons, at the beginning of what I shall say to-day, I would bring the discussion back to the broadest consideration of the subject with which this bill proposes to deal.

THE RELATION OF GOVERNMENT TO COMMERCE AND TRANSPORTATION.

The commerce of a country is a measure of its material power. It is the product of all the labor and capital of the country—on the farms, in the mines, and factories, and shops, and every field of material production.

The labor and capital of a country employed in production upon a basis attaining to the upbuilding of any community is everywhere absolutely dependent on transportation.

The founders of this Government understood that commerce is vital to organized society; that the development of the country depends upon the ready exchange of commodities between its different communities and sections. And so they ordained that commerce should be free between the States.

The founders of the Government and those who followed them understood that transportation is properly a function of government, and so they built highways, and turnpikes, and dug canals, and improved rivers and harbors, and finally built State railroads and aided in the building of interstate railroads. These highways by land and water were paid for wholly or in part out of the public treasury and the public domain.

The vital interest of organized society in commerce and the public nature of transportation imposes upon government the duty to maintain a control over transportation as a public service. Hence upon the broadest ground of public policy, wholly apart from any power to control, dependent upon charter grants, government must exercise, as a sovereign right, absolute authority over all persons and all property engaged in transportation.

The public character of the transportation service and the inherent right in sovereignty to exercise control over it, imposes upon the Government the obligation to require the common carrier to render the service upon reasonable terms and upon equal terms. For the Government to fail in this duty, for it to turn over to railroad corporations the uncontrolled right to dictate the terms of service and its character, is to abandon a function of government and place the common carrier in the control of the commerce of the country. To permit the railroads to control the commerce of the country is, in the final analysis, to permit the railroads to control the country.

I maintain, then, that the authority of government to control transportation, both as to the character of the service and the rate of the service, is inherent as a right of sovereignty and that the obligation rests upon government to exercise this power.

I shall undertake now to show that the adjudicated cases fully sustain this contention.

OBVIOUSLY UNSOUND CONSTITUTIONAL ARGUMENTS.

The history of the effort of the States and of the United States to regulate commerce, like other questions of great moment when there is conflict of views, is associated with the struggle over the constitutionality of each advance step that has been taken.

In the framing of a great piece of legislation it is impossible to overestimate the importance of all sincere effort to insure its constitutionality and to make it conform to the decisions of the Supreme Court. But there is a distinction in such legal discussion that should be kept clearly in mind. There is always the effort of the friends of a measure to insure its standing the test of the courts, and there is sometimes a determined effort of opponents to defeat it by attacking its constitutionality.

The measure before us has been described as "drastic" and "revolutionary;" as "contrary to the spirit of our institutions;" as "raising some of the most important questions with which we have had to deal since the civil war." It has been suggested that it owes its origin to "public clamor," and that it never commanded any serious attention until the President mentioned it in his message. Yet it is quite significant that the fight against the bill has been over constitutional questions. No Senator has taken the floor of the Senate in open opposition to the regulation of railroad transportation.

In the discussion of constitutional questions well-wrought-out theories have been substituted for the settled conclusions of law, as declared in the great body of decisions rendered on these questions since the adoption of the Constitution. Arguments have been made in opposition to this legislation that have been rejected again and again by the Supreme Court, and declared not to be the law in a long line of undisturbed decisions.

It has been contended that rate making was not in the mind of the framers of the Constitution, and therefore the Constitution can have no application to it, in direct contradiction of the decision in the Dartmouth College case, where it was held, and has never been successfully controverted since, that—

> The case being within the words of the law must be within its operation likewise.

By the new standard now sought to be set up, the fourteenth amendment would apply only to negroes, since they were the only persons in mind when the amendment was framed. Likewise, the fifth amendment would not apply to corporations, since only natural persons were meant, as frequently asserted by the courts. The stress placed upon the argument that common carriers could not charge unreasonable rates at common law would, if carried to its logical conclusion, prove that all the progressive legislation, State and Federal, for the control of transportation was entirely unnecessary and could as well be wiped off the statute books.

The argument on the clause, "No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another," assumes, in direct opposition to repeated decisions, that the Commission must adopt a rate of so much per ton per mile as a reasonable rate.

Moreover, the discussion of this provision of the Constitution presumes that the railroads are conducting their business in direct violation of the intent and spirit of this clause of the Constitution. The moral obligation of the Government to exercise its power to prevent such violation is entirely ignored.

Taking the construction of the Constitution contended for by those who make this argument, is there not, then, an obligation on the part of the Federal Government, under any rational interpretation of the true meaning and spirit of this delegation of power, not only to give no preference, but to see that no preference is given? The States surrender all their commerce and all their power of regulation over it to the General Government, subject to the stipulation that in the exercise of that power no preference should be given to any power. Ought not the Government to protect the commerce of the States which have lost the right to protect it themselves? Ought not the Government to see to it that the transportation companies, over which the States have no control, which the Government alone can regulate, shall not do the very thing which the States expressly stipulated should not be done by the Government?

If the Federal Government permits a third party, subject to control by no one but the Federal Government, to do the very thing which it was expressly forbidden to do, is it not, in fact, doing the forbidden thing itself? Is it not, in effect, a violation of the spirit of this very provision of the Constitution for the Federal Government to allow the railway companies to give preference to the ports of one State over another by parceling out its commerce to suit themselves?

The contention that the power to regulate interstate commerce is identical with the power to regulate foreign commerce; that most of our foreign commerce is carried in foreign ships; that we can not regulate foreign ships; therefore we can not regulate nor prescribe the rates of railroads doing business in the United States, these and many other like arguments heard in this debate demonstrate the spirit of much of the constitutional discussion and opposition to the control of railway rates. Evidently the concluding paragraph of Mr. Justice Marshall's great opinion in Gibbon v. Ogden is as significant to-day as when delivered years ago:

> Powerful and ingenious minds * * * may, by a course of well-digested and metaphysical reasoning * * * explain away the Constitution of our country and leave it a magnificent structure, indeed, to look at, but totally unfit for use. This may so entangle and perplex the understanding as to obscure principles which were before thought quite plain, and induce doubts where, if the mind were to pursue its own course, none would be perceived.

POWER OF UNITED STATES OVER INTERSTATE COMMERCE SAME AS POWER OF STATES OVER STATE COMMERCE.

In the long conflict between the States and the corporations the railroads have resisted, step by step, the inevitable conclusion of law that the State can fix the rates of transportation.

What the railroad corporations most dread in this contest to-day is that Congress shall assert the same right for the National Government to fix the rate for interstate commerce that the States exercise over State traffic. If it is admitted that Congress has the same power over interstate commerce that the States have over State commerce, there is no ground for further litigation. Such an admission would sweep away all opportunity for long legal controversy. It would settle the issue.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] says:

> The assumption that Congress has the power to fix rates as a part of the power to regulate commerce is largely due to the fact, no doubt, that the States undeniably have this power.

It follows that his contention that Congress has not the power to fix rates fails absolutely if the power of the United States Government over interstate commerce is the same as the power of State governments over State commerce.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] speaks of "difference in radical relation of the States and of the nation to the subject of rate making."

It becomes very important to definitely determine, if possible, whether the power of the United States over interstate commerce is the same as the power of a State over State commerce.

In the case of Gibbon v. Ogden Mr. Justice Johnson, cited by the Senator from Ohio as authority for his position, said (p. 225):

The "power to regulate commerce" here meant to be granted, was that power to regulate commerce which previously existed in the States. But what was that power? The States were, unquestionably, supreme; and each possessed that power over commerce, which is acknowledged to reside in every sovereign State.

And again (same page):

The history of the times will, therefore, sustain the opinion, that the grant of power over commerce, if intended to be commensurate with the evils existing, and the purpose of remedying those evils, could be only commensurate with the power of the States over the subject.

Chief Justice Marshall said, in his opinion of this case (p. 195):

The completely internal commerce of a State, then, may be considered as reserved for the State itself.

Plainly implying that all other power was conferred upon Congress, the sovereign power which existed in Parliament, and the federation passed to the National Government. Nor does he stop with this plain inference. He expressly states (p. 195):

If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government, having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States. The wisdom and the discretion of Congress, their identity with the people, and the influence which their constituents possess at elections are, in this, as in many other instances, as that, for example, of declaring war, the sole restraints on which they have relied to secure them from its abuse. They are the restraints on which the people must often rely, solely, in all representative governments.

In McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheaton, p. 405) Chief Justice Marshall says:

If any one proposition could command the universal consent of mankind, we might expect it would be this—that the Government of the Union, though limited in its powers, is supreme within its sphere of action.

And further (p. 410):

In America the powers of sovereignty are divided between the Government of the Union and those of the States. They are each sovereign with respect to the objects committed to it, and neither sovereign with respect to the objects committed to the other.

In Brown v. Maryland (12 Wheaton, 446) he said:

Those who felt the injury arising from this state of things, and those who were capable of estimating the influence of commerce on the property of nations perceived the necessity of giving the control over this important subject to a single government. * * * It is not, therefore, a matter of surprise that the grant should be as extensive as the mischief, and should comprehend all foreign commerce and all commerce among the States.

These basic principles upon which the authority of our Government rests, have all been cited again and again by our Supreme Court, whenever questions involving the right of Congress to regulate commerce have arisen.

Justice Harlan, in the Northern Securities case, after quoting the principle laid down by Justice Marshall in Gibbon v. Ogden, saying it had never been modified by subsequent decision, inquires (p. 341) whether there is any escape from the conclusion that—

The power of Congress over interstate and international commerce is as full and complete as is the power of any State over its domestic commerce.

Justice White, in his dissenting opinion in this same case, says (p. 339):

It can not be denied that the sum of all just governmental power was enjoyed by the States and the people before the Constitution of the United States was formed. None of the power was abridged by that instrument, except as restrained by constitutional safeguards, and hence none was lost by the adoption of the Constitution. The Constitution, whilst distributing the preexisting authority, preserved it all.

He says further in this case:

The right of Congress to regulate to the fullest extent, to fix the rate to be charged for the movement of interstate commerce, and to exert any power that flows from the Constitution is conceded.

So much has been said of a parenthetical remark by Mr. Justice Harlan in the Northern Securities case, that I feel warranted in taking time for an explanation which I believe an analysis of the opinion in the case will fully justify. In the first place the conclusion drawn from the interpolated sentence is contrary, not only to the citation just made, but to the whole tenor of Justice Harlan's reasoning on the power of Congress to regulate.

While widely differing as to other legal questions involved, Justices Harlan and White agree perfectly as to the fundamental power of Congress.

Mr. Justice Harlan argues that if a State may strike at combinations in restraint of trade within its exclusive jurisdiction, Congress has the power to protect interstate commerce against such combinations. Mr. Justice White no less emphatically asserts that the right of Congress is conceded to regulate to the fullest extent, to fix the rate to be charged for the movement of interstate commerce, and to exert every power that flows from the authority of the Constitution.

But on the other points in the case the two learned judges widely differ. If, instead of reading in cold type, their contending opinions, we imagine ourselves in the consultation room, we get new light on an apparent discrepancy. Justice Harlan says—I quote from his opinion:

Indeed, if the contentions of the defendants are sound, why may not all the railway companies in the United States that are engaged under State charters in interstate and international commerce enter into a combination as the one here in question, and by the device of a holding corporation obtain the absolute control throughout the entire country of rates for passengers and freight beyond the power of Congress to protect the public against their exactions? The argument in behalf of the defendants necessarily leads to such results, and places Congress, although invested by the people of the United States with full authority to regulate interstate and international commerce, in a condition of utter helplessness, so far as the protection of the public against such combinations is concerned.

Justice White replies—I quote from his opinion:

With the full power of the States over corporations created by them and with their authority in respect to local legislation and with power in Congress over interstate commerce, carried to its fullest degree, I can not conceive that if these powers admittedly possessed by both be fully exerted, a remedy can not be provided fully adequate to suppress evils which may arise from combinations deemed to be injurious. This must be true, unless it be concluded that by the effect of the mere distribution of power made by the Constitution partial impotency of governmental authority has resulted.

Obviously meaning that the fixing of the rates would suppress the evils complained of in the discussion.

Justice Harlan answers—quoting again from his opinion:

Will it be said that Congress can meet such emergencies by prescribing the rates by which interstate carriers shall be governed in the transportation of freight and passengers? If Congress has the power to fix such rates—and upon that question we express no opinion—it does not choose to express its power in that way or to that extent. It has, all will agree, a large discretion as to the means to be employed in the exercise of any power granted to it. For the present it has determined to go no further than to protect the freedom of commerce among the States and with foreign States by declaring illegal all contracts, combinations, conspiracies, or monopolies in restraint of such commerce, and make it a public offense to violate the rule thus prescribed. How much further it may go we do not now say. We need only at this time consider whether it has exceeded its power in enacting the statute here in question.

Taken in connection with the context, it is in accordance with the spirit, the reasoning, and the language of the great opinion to interpret the parenthetical remark to mean that if Congress has the power to fix such rates—as it undoubtedly has, but the question not being in issue we express no opinion—it does not choose to exercise its power in that way or to that extent. This view is sustained by—

How much further it may go we do not now say. We need only at this time consider whether it has exceeded its powers in enacting this power here in question.

While it has no relevancy to the legal merits of the case, it may be worth while to notice in passing that Justice Harlan at another point makes a similar parenthetical remark in the course of his argument. On page 351 he says:

But if nothing more can be said than that Congress has erred—and the court must not be understood as saying that it has or has not erred—the remedy for the error and the attendant mischief is the selection of new Senators and Representatives, who, by legislation, will make such changes in existing statutes as may be demanded by their constituents and be consistent with law.

On page 337 he says:

Undoubtedly there are those who think that the general business interests and prosperity of the country will be best promoted if the rule of competition is not applied. But there are others who believe that such a rule is more necessary in these days of enormous wealth than it ever was in any former period of history.

One almost feels warranted in believing the court did not think Congress had erred in spite of the parenthetical reservation. No more do I believe he thought or meant to say that the power of Congress to fix rates was an open question.

RIGHT TO FIX RATES NOT DEPENDENT ON FRANCHISE.

It is true that the States have emphasized the franchise as warrant and justification for the regulation of rates.

But the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that the right to regulate does not originate in the right to charter, but rests upon the broad principle that when property is devoted to public use it is subject to control in the public interest. Chief Justice Waite, in Munn v. Illinois (94 U. S. 113), after a thorough review of English and American authorities, settled beyond controversy that property devoted to public service was from the nature of the business subject to Government control.

In Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railway Company v. Iowa (94 U. S., p. 161) Chief Justice Waite directly and explicitly applies the rule laid down in Munn v. Illinois to railroad rate regulation:

Railroad companies are carriers for hire. They are therefore engaged in a public employment affecting the public interest, and under the decision in Munn v. Illinois (supra, p. 113) subject to legislative control as to their rates of fare and freight, unless protected by their charters.

In Pick v. Chicago (94 U. S., p. 176):

In Munn v. Illinois (supra, p. 113) and Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railway Company v. Iowa (supra, p. 155) we decided that the State may limit the amount of charges by railroad companies for fares and freights, unless restrained by some contract in the charter.

The power of Congress, therefore, to fix rates of fare and freight extends to all interstate commerce. It is not limited to the railroad it has incorporated. On the other hand, the only possible legal escape from regulation is in the case of roads that may have secured specific exemption from regulation under charters granted by the Government. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided that Congress has the same power over interstate commerce that the States have over State commerce. It has decided that the States can fix rates through a commission. What the States can do in regulating State traffic Congress can do in regulating interstate traffic.

The right to fix the rate is not, as has been assumed in this discussion, an extension of the power to regulate commerce. It is included in, and inseparable from, the power to insure reasonable rates. It is the means to an end. A rate is compensation for service. There is no difference in principle in fixing a maximum, a minimum, or an absolute rate. The fixing of the rate is but a corollary to the power to insure reasonable rates.

SUPREME COURT DECISIONS PRESERVE FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS OF GOVERNMENT.

Corporate interests have little reason to expect aid and comfort from the Supreme Court. The opinion by Mr. Justice White in the Coal case, delivered in February, that by Mr. Justice Harlan in the Chicago Corporation cases, in March, and the opinion by Mr. Justice Brewer in the Michigan Tax case, rendered within a few days, are opportune illustrations of the conservation by the Supreme Court of the inherent rights of the people against the encroachment of corporate power. To the great honor of the court and to the preservation of Government, this final tribunal remains as unsullied and ideal to-day as when created by the Constitution. The great interests have not hesitated to corrupt legislation and propose its attorneys for judicial appointment, but its taint has never reached the Supreme Court of the United States.

Our system of courts is complicated. Decisions are numerous. The wisest men differ; sometimes err. Language can not be used so perfectly that misunderstanding may not arise as to its meaning. Even when principles of law have been well established there always remain isolated cases that can be cited to prove conflict of authority.

But, as has been ably shown in this debate, the long line of authoritative decisions by our Supreme Court in epoch-making cases, arising out of rate regulation for the past thirty-odd years, have been consistent and unwavering in the application of fundamental principles for the preservation of which our Government was founded.

More progress has been made through the court decisions than by specific legislation. The overbalancing control of State and national legislatures by public-service corporations has often resulted in weak laws. But the Supreme Court, in deciding questions arising under these laws, has settled important constitutional rights. The decisions furnish a solid basis upon which to legislate at this time.

The people have no need to fear the final judgment of the Supreme Court. Indeed, they have every reason to seek the final adjudication of questions involving public rights by our highest court. Again and again it has interposed the strong arm of the law between the people and the unlawful encroachment of corporate power.

When in the early seventies the struggle between the States and the railroads culminated in the so-called "Granger" legislation, it was the courts that rebuked the corporations for trampling on the rights of the people, and in language never to be forgotten illuminated this whole question. They showed that the great movement was not, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has described this legislation to be—the result of "public clamor" nor "sporadic excitement"—but that it was an uprising against abuse of power, and was based upon fundamental rights.

In the Attorney-General v. The Railroad Companies (35 Wisconsin, 580), Chief Justice Ryan said:

We listened to a great deal of denunciation of chapter 273 which, we think, was misapplied. We do not mean to say that the act is not open to criticism. We only say that such criticism is unfounded. It was said that its provisions which have been noticed were not within the scope of the legislative function; as if every compilation of statutes, everywhere, in all time, did not contain provisions limiting and regulating tolls; as if the very franchise altered were not a rebuke to such clamor. It was repeated, with a singular confusion of ideas and a singular perversion of terms, that the provisions of the chapter amount to an act of confiscation; a well-defined term in the law, signifying the appropriation by the State, to itself, for its own use, as upon forfeiture, the whole thing confiscated. It was denounced as an act of communism. We thank God that communism is a foreign abomination without recognition or sympathy here. The people of Wisconsin are too intelligent, too staid, too just, too busy, too prosperous for any such horror of doctrine; for any leaning toward confiscation or communism. And these wild terms are as applicable to a statute limiting the rates of toll on railroads as the term "murder" is to the surgeon's wholesome use of the knife to save life, not to take it. Such objections do not rise to the dignity of argument. They belong to that order of grumbling against legal duty and legal liability which would rail the seal from off the bond.

And again, referring to the claim that the legislation was the result of passion, he said, if there be anger—

It is rather of the nature of parental anger against those spoiled children of legislation, as our statute books abundantly show them to be, who, after some quarter of a century of legislative favors, lavishly showered upon them, unwisely mutiny against the first serious legislative restraint they have met.

In 1876 Chief Justice Waite, in Munn v. Illinois and the Granger cases, made secure to the people the fundamental principle that "when property is devoted to public use it is subject to public regulation."

The spirit in which the courts administered the responsibility laid upon them in these cases is well expressed by Justice Waite in the closing words of his decision:

In passing upon the case we have not been unmindful of the vast importance of the questions involved. This and cases of a kindred character were argued before us more than a year ago by most eminent counsel, and in a manner worthy of their well-earned reputations. We have kept the cases long under advisement in order that their decision might be the result of our mature deliberation.

From the decision of those cases to the present time the trend of the interpretation, and of the application of the law by the courts of last resort to the multitude of cases that have arisen, has been a distinct gain for popular rights.

"BROAD" COURT REVIEW.

It should be remembered that effort to limit the jurisdiction of the courts within the constitutional right to limit is not an expression of distrust of the final adjudication of corporation questions by the Supreme Court.

The appointment of judges of the inferior courts upon the recommendation of United States Senators as a part of the ordinary official patronage is bad in principle, and one which has not been without occasional bad results. Where judges have been identified with corporate interests previous to their appointment upon the bench there is danger of bias in judgment, even though motives may not be questioned. With the great awakening to the dangers that threaten representative government through corporate influence, there undoubtedly exists some uneasiness as to whether even the sacred tribunals of justice have entirely escaped the entangling net of the "system" from which the nation is struggling to free itself.

Nevertheless, it is not the fear of the direct or indirect corruption of the courts that constitutes the primary motive back of this effort to limit the jurisdiction of the courts. It is fear of the abuse of the right of litigation.

It is common knowledge that whenever any legislation affects railroad interests—no matter how just and righteous it may be—they convert the machinery of the law into an instrument to defeat the purpose of the law.

Mr. President, I hope I am not prejudiced against any interests involved in legislation. The first duty of a legislator is to free his judgment from bias. I trust that long contention with the forces this legislation aims to control has not warped my standard. The organized wealth of this country is aggressive. It is unscrupulous. No power other than that of the Government can cope with it. I believe the existence of government—real, representative government for the people—is at stake. The sovereign right conferred on Congress to regulate commerce is the vantage ground in the struggle.

No matter how great the burden, how grievous the wrong, no State can go outside its boundaries to exercise the sovereign right to protect its citizens from tyranny of transportation companies. Even within their own boundaries the States are seriously handicapped by the constitutional limitations respecting State and interstate commerce, as everyone well knows who has attempted to do anything with the State problem.

The great bulk of commerce is interstate. The National Government has the exclusive power to regulate interstate commerce. It has the responsibility that goes with the power. Shall Congress use it freely, courageously, or timidly, cringingly, ineffectively?

The Supreme Court has decided that the Constitution fixes a limitation upon the power of Congress to establish rates. The fifth amendment provides that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. The constitutionality of the orders of the Commission can always be tested on this ground, regardless of any express provision in the law to that effect.

Legally, it is as needless to provide that carriers may appeal to the courts to test the constitutionality of a law affecting their interests as it would be to add that provision to each and every law that passes Congress. The question of providing a so-called "broad court review" has resolved itself into one of public policy. Shall Congress expressly or impliedly extend to the carriers greater privileges of litigation than the Constitution guarantees them, or shall Congress limit their opportunity of litigation in so far as the Constitution permits?

Why should Congress provide that the railroads shall have the right to appeal from the rate established by the Commission on any other than constitutional grounds? Is not the provision that their property shall not be taken without just compensation sufficient protection? Does any man fear the precedent? Is it not the same test that the private citizen must abide when the railroad, by the authority conferred on it by the State, takes his home, without regard to its precious associations, and awards him only just compensation?

Does any man fear that limiting railroad companies to their constitutional rights will work them any wrong? Consider that Congress might itself fix a schedule of rates and prescribe specific regulations. What does it do instead? It creates a Commission. The Interstate Commerce Commission is appointed by the President. It is confirmed by the Senate. It is charged with great responsibility and great power. It must be assumed that the President in appointing, and the Senate in confirming, will exercise great care. Their selection will be made with the same singleness of purpose with which the Supreme Court of the United States is chosen. Integrity, ability, fitness will be the consideration.

The members of the Commission, by the terms of the act, give all their time exclusively to the study of this single complex problem. They acquire expert knowledge. They reach definite well-grounded conclusions as to what constitutes reasonable rates and just practices in transportation. They are as conscientious as any court would be in the discharge of the duties assigned. Their judgment when finally reached is as deliberate, unbiased, and disinterested as that of any court. It is their duty to insure reasonable and just transportation rates to the public and to prevent unfair and discriminatory charges. That would be the duty of the court likewise. But the Commission presumably has a very much broader knowledge and deeper insight into the determining facts than any court could acquire in the course of a brief trial.

The Commission and the courts should complement each other. The Commission is the tribunal of the facts; the courts of the law. The Commission must always have consideration of the law in its application to facts. The courts must, of course, consider facts in the application of the law; but it is in the public interest that the judgment of the Commission on the facts should be final where possible.

There should be no unnecessary complexity in the solution of a great problem. There should be intelligent and economic division of work. The courts review the laws made by Congress to test their constitutionality. The Supreme Court has repeatedly said it does not pass upon the wisdom of laws.

The Commission may err. The judgment of the wisest, most conscientious, and most expert man is not always infallible. The conclusions of the court are not always infallible. But we must abide by them. For generations of time the judgment of juries as to facts has been accepted as final. How much more reliable the judgment of expert commissioners of the same high character and standing as the court. When the plain citizen must abide the verdict of the jury as to the facts, can it be seriously contended that the corporations should be accorded the privilege of having the facts adjudged by an expert commission tried over again in the courts? Is not their constitutional right a sufficient guaranty that they will not suffer serious wrong?

Does any man honestly believe the corporations are clamoring for a broad review in the interest of justice? Would they care for the privilege except as it gives opportunity for the endless delays of litigation that tend to defeat substantial justice?

PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION.

Within the past ten days the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has made an argument that will be memorable in history. It is generally conceded that the adoption of his proposed amendment is no longer a constitutional question. It is now before the Senate as a question of public policy.

The acceptance of this amendment and the rejection of the proposition of a broad court review have the same sound basis.

The common-law right to preliminary injunction was to prevent "irreparable injury." The creation of a commission of this high order to investigate the subject and decide upon rates with the same deliberate judgment exercised by a court, precludes the necessity of this procedure.

There is much less danger of railroad companies suffering from the decisions of the Commission than of the shippers being wronged by the action of the court that grants the preliminary injunction. The order of the Commission is reached after full consideration of all the facts; that of the court for preliminary injunction is the judgment of one judge upon affidavit by an interested party.

I would not, in dealing with corporations, establish any precedent that might not be safely applied to protect the property rights of any citizen. But I would not be more careful, more cautious, more timid in dealing with corporations than in dealing with individuals. It has seemed to me that some who have spoken for this legislation have been too much on the defensive. They have been more eloquent and enthusiastic over their anxiety to defend the corporate interests from all harm than over their desire to frame a law that will bring railroad corporations back to their plain duties as common carriers, and protect the people from the existing intolerable abuses in transportation.

Prohibiting the use of preliminary injunction will enhance the value of this legislation beyond all computation. The operation of the law will be simplified and justice promoted.

To cut out this much-abused process will not confer autocratic power upon the Commission. Indeed, it will not in anywise affect the power of the Commission. It will put upon the railroad companies the burden of hastening instead of delaying the final judgment of the court if they are sincerely seeking to secure justice.

Mr. President, I pause in my remarks to say this. I can not be wholly indifferent to the fact that Senators by their absence at this time indicate their want of interest in what I may have to say upon this subject. The public is interested. Unless this important question is rightly settled seats now temporarily vacant may be permanently vacated by those who have the right to occupy them at this time. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not ask to have Senators called back here who feel no interest in what I have to say. I know that the country will take interest in the discussion that I shall make of the defects in this proposed legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LONG in the chair). The Senator from Wisconsin will suspend.

Mr. KEAN. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey will state his question of order.

Mr. KEAN. I ask that the rules of the Senate be enforced, and that the galleries be cleared.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Presiding Officer will admonish the occupants of the galleries, that it is contrary to the rules of the Senate to express approval or disapproval of any remarks that may be made, and upon a recurrence of it the galleries will be ordered cleared.

HISTORY OF THE MOVEMENT.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Partisan politics should have no place in our discussion of this measure. It should influence no man's action. The question with which we are dealing goes too deeply into the life of the people of this country and the integrity of their Government to permit a single page of the record we are making to be stained with party strife for party advantage.

That this bill is before Congress to-day goes to the credit of no party, no platform, no man. It is here because the subject with which it purports to deal can no longer be suppressed. The principle back of this bill is not new. It was written in the Constitution in the beginning and asserted as a legislative power by four States in the upper Mississippi Valley more than thirty years ago. It is here to-day in the fullness of a generation of lusty growth, demanding not partial, but complete recognition.

Let us not mistake. This is no spasm of sentiment, no angry protest fired by agitation. It is the mature judgment of an enlightened public opinion, ripened by long experience and patient investigation. More than a score of years have passed since it became the settled conviction of the country—shippers, consumers, and producers alike—that the Federal Government had the absolute right and owed it as a duty to the public to regulate and control transportation charges on interstate commerce.

GRANGER STATE LEGISLATION.

Wisconsin, Illinois, Iowa, and Minnesota had led the way. The legislation of that period, known in the decisions and in history as the "Granger legislation," has suffered unjust criticism from that day to this. It was denounced as radical and revolutionary; as certain to demoralize business, drive out capital, stop all railroad construction, and arrest all development within the limits of these four States. Determined to prevent the spread of that legislation to other States, the press and periodicals were enlisted, economic writers employed, statistical bureaus organized, and all the agencies which the carriers of the country could command were set in motion to that end.

The literature of that time teems with startling accounts of "Railroad construction at a standstill," the "Collapse of railroad business," the "Spoliation and ruination of railroad property," the "Checking of all development in the Granger States." In that period the railroads were almost wholly in command of the statistics essential to an intelligent discussion of the question. They falsified the figures and imposed upon the public. It is not strange that economic writers of reputation, accepting the data of that heated time, should have been misled.

It is due to the pioneers of that movement and pertinent to this discussion that the misstatements of fact which have stood for thirty years should be corrected.

The Granger legislation was a rational and conservative protest, in statutory form, against an arbitrary, unjust, and oppressive control of transportation and transportation charges by common carriers.

Mr. A. B. Stickney, president of the Chicago and Great Western Railroad, in his work on "The Railway Problem," written with an intimate knowledge of the conditions leading up to the Granger legislation, says of the methods employed by these corporations:

> The companies at first denied that they were common carriers or subject to the duties or restrictions imposed upon such carriers by the common law. * * * The managers claimed the right to charge such rates * * * as they deemed for the best interests of their respective companies regardless of their reasonableness or equality. They claimed and exercised the right to grant monopolies in business to favored individuals and firms * * * by exercise of their powers to discriminate in regard to rates and combinations. * * * They assumed the right to dictate to communities in what market town they would sell their produce and buy their supplies. Thus a community located 40 miles distant from St. Paul and 400 miles distant from Chicago was compelled to trade in Chicago, so as to give the railway the long haul, and in order to enforce this dictation they did not hesitate to make the rate for 40 miles as much or more than for 400 miles. * * * They believed they had the right so to make their schedule of rates, as to determine which of the villages on their line should become centers of trade beyond their local territory. * * * They also varied their schedules in such a way that they discriminated in regard to rates between individual merchants, manufacturers, miners, and other business men, so as practically to determine which should become prosperous and wealthy, and which should not.

As I shall have occasion to show later, the railroads of the country, excepting where partially restrained by law, have continued to the present time the identical wrongs and the same abuse of power which they practised upon the people in Wisconsin, Illinois, Iowa, and Minnesota, set forth in the quotation from President Stickney.

The Granger statutes, so long and violently condemned, were imperfect with respect to some of the provisions for their enforcement, but they were correct in asserting the principle of government control, and were reasonable in their terms, in so far as the railroads were concerned.

The Wisconsin law was enacted in 1874 and repealed in 1876, and Granger laws were enacted—Minnesota in 1871, Illinois in 1873, and Iowa in 1874. By the beginning of 1875 it may be assumed that the effect of these Granger statutes would be fairly felt in all of the Granger States. Michigan, Indiana, Missouri, and Nebraska are four States more nearly similar in development, character of industry, and population than any other States with which comparison could be instituted. These four last-named States were not affected by the so-called Granger legislation.

It is possible, therefore, by comparison, to ascertain the effect of the railroad legislation upon the four Granger States. I have also worked out a like comparison with the Middle Atlantic States, namely, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and West Virginia, in one group; the Southern States—Kentucky, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, and Mississippi—in another group; and, finally, broadened the entire comparison to and including the railway mileage of all the States in the Union. I was thus able to test the results of the Granger legislation upon the railroads of the Granger States, by comparing railroad development and railroad receipts between the Granger States and the four adjoining States, between the Granger States and the Middle Atlantic States named, between the Granger States and the Southern States named, and likewise a comparison of the progress of railroad building and railroad receipts in the four Granger States as compared with the country at large.

I submit a table showing the railway mileage for the years 1871 to 1880:

States.	1871.	1873.	1875.	1880.
Wisconsin, Illinois, Iowa, and Minnesota	12,401	14,627	15,515	19,428
Michigan, Indiana, Missouri, and Nebraska	9,168	10,932	11,381	14,336
Middle Atlantic States	12,030	13,643	14,455	15,949
United States	60,293	70,278	74,096	93,671

Taking the railroad mileage for 1873, the year immediately preceding the legislation, and comparing it with the railroad mileage in 1875, by which time the effect of the Granger laws should have become clearly manifest, we find that railroad construction increased for the four Granger States 6.1 per cent; the four adjoining States, 4.1 per cent; the Atlantic States, 5.9 per cent; the Southern States, 2.4 per cent, and the United States, as a whole, 5.5 per cent.

It will therefore be seen that the Granger legislation did not stop railroad construction in the four Granger States. Indeed, they not only held their own, but increased their railroad mileage over their immediate neighbors, and the other groups with which comparison is made, as well as the country at large. Let us test the matter further.

The following table shows the gross earnings for the years 1871 to 1880:

States.	1871.	1873.	1875.	1880.
Wisconsin, Illinois, and Iowa	$54,994,114	$70,027,777	$69,621,065	$86,954,346
Michigan, Indiana, and Missouri	44,433,246	59,106,865	54,731,069	79,038,920
Middle Atlantic States	147,130,494	194,052,202	175,677,418	199,003,718

I found it impossible to include Minnesota and Nebraska in this comparison, for the reason that I could not procure complete data of the railway earnings of those States for the period named. For this reason, excepting those two States—Minnesota from the group of Granger States and Nebraska from the group of adjoining States—carrying out the same comparisons with the several groups of States included in the calculations with respect to railway mileage, I found that the gross earnings decreased in the Granger States from 1873 to and including 1875 one-half of 1 per cent; in the adjoining States, 7½ per cent; in the Middle States the gross earnings decreased 9½ per cent; in the Southern States, 6½ per cent; in the whole country, 4.4 per cent. It is shown, therefore, that during this period of general decline in the gross receipts of the railways the earnings in the Granger States were less affected than adjoining States or in the other groups and suffered vastly less than the country at large.

The comparison of net earnings is equally significant. In the Granger States from 1873 to 1875 there was a substantial increase in the net earnings. In the adjoining States there was a decline in the net earnings amounting to 3 per cent. It therefore appears that the railroads of the Granger States were able to withstand not only the "dire effects" of the Granger legislation, but the depression which began with the panic in the money and stock markets in 1873 and spread to every operation in finance and commerce, continuing until the end of 1878.

I have submitted in this connection but a small portion of the results of an investigation of this subject, every fact of which makes the demonstration stronger, that the Granger legislation neither retarded railway construction nor diminished railway receipts; that it did not demoralize business or stay industrial development anywhere within its jurisdiction. The hue and cry raised by the railroads in advance, and continued after the statutes were enacted, accompanied with threats and warning, served in some measure the purpose of the railroad companies.

Within two years they secured control of the Wisconsin legislature and repealed the Granger statute in that State. For twenty-eight years thereafter they were powerful enough in the legislature of Wisconsin to defeat the enactment of any law for the regulation of railway rates within that State. The Minnesota statute was likewise repealed. Illinois maintained her hold upon the legislation secured, and succeeded in strengthening it in some measure. In Iowa the struggle was protracted until 1888, when she enacted a new and in many respects a most excellent statute, under which rates were established by a commission which, at the time, were fair to the railroads and just to the people.

I shall have occasion later to refer to these States as bearing upon the proposition to invest a Federal commission with full power to ascertain and enforce reasonable rates.

FEDERAL LEGISLATION.

I come now to the consideration of Federal legislation. It was inevitable that the conditions which invoked State authority in regulation of State commerce should seek to secure the exercise of Government authority in the regulation of interstate commerce; and it was to be expected that the section of the country which had first proclaimed the right to control common carriers through State legislation should furnish the men to first assert that right in Federal legislation.

March 26, 1874, the House of Representatives passed a bill introduced by Mr. McCrary, of Iowa, which marks the beginning of positive legislative action upon the broad question of railway rate regulation.

It has been asserted in this debate that the first bill ever introduced in Congress upon that subject was introduced by Mr. Charles Sumner. As no copy of that bill can be found in the files of Congress, and as the title is somewhat misleading, it is quite natural that that statement should have been made. An investigation of contemporary publications, however, discloses the fact that the Sumner bill had reference solely to the transportation of troops and did not deal at all with the question under consideration by Congress at the present time.

The McCrary bill, considering the early date of its adoption in the House—thirteen years before the final passage of the interstate-commerce act—was a very comprehensive measure and merits some attention in this connection. Referring only to the main provisions respecting the regulation of rates: It provided that no interstate carrier should receive more than a fair and reasonable rate of compensation for any transportation service. It proposed to create a board of railroad commissioners of nine members. The commissioners were empowered to investigate thoroughly freight and passenger charges, and the reasonableness thereof, and prepare schedules of reasonable maximum rates, and to change and revise the same "so often as circumstances may require." Penalties were provided for charging more than reasonable rates, and it was made the duty of the Commission to bring suit, upon ascertaining facts warranting such action, for the enforcement of said penalties. If upon trial of said suit it should appear that the defendant had charged more than provided for in such schedules, it was provided that—

> In that case such defendant shall be deemed and held guilty of extortion and liable therefor, unless such defendant shall show affirmatively that the rate charged * * * was nevertheless fair and reasonable.

The bill was so amended pending its consideration by the House as to make its penalties apply to discriminations as well as to unreasonable and extortionate rates. The McCrary bill did not pass the Senate.

From the passage of the McCrary bill by the House, March 25, 1874, neither branch of Congress passed any measure until 1878, when the House passed the Reagan bill. In the meantime the system of discriminations between persons, localities, and commodities, which were of secondary consideration when the McCrary bill was passed, had grown so aggravated in character as to become of primary interest by 1878. This is reflected in the new bills introduced from 1874 to 1878. It doubtless accounts mainly for the fact that the Reagan bill of this date was designed to prevent discriminations. The Reagan bill passed the House, but it did not pass the Senate.

Two years before the Reagan bill of 1878 passed the House, the Supreme Court had decided the Granger cases and the Munn case, and had settled great principles lying at the foundation of this important subject. Its decisions pointed the way for Congress. Yet no legislation was enacted until 1887, when the interstate-commerce law was finally passed.

The act of 1887 declared unreasonable rates unlawful, and imposed penalties for discriminations as to persons, places, and commodities. The report made by the Committee on Interstate Commerce presenting the bill to the Senate states the evils which the bill was intended to remedy, and among them enumerated the following:

> That local rates are unreasonably high as compared with through rates.
> That both local rates and through rates are unreasonably high at noncompeting points, either from the absence of competition or in consequence of pooling agreements that restrict its operation.
> That rates are established without apparent regard to the services performed, and are based largely on what the traffic will bear.
> That the stock and bonded indebtedness of the roads largely exceed the actual cost of their construction or their present value, and that unreasonable rates are charged in the effort to pay dividends on watered stock and interest on bonds improperly issued.

The report from which the foregoing is extracted is voluminous and is one of the important contributions to the literature of this subject.

RAILROADS AND TRUSTS.

Mr. President, I have sketched briefly the main facts in the development and history of legislation in relation to the transportation problem down to the date of the enactment of the interstate-commerce law in 1887. During this period—from 1870 to 1887—many events of great moment transpired with respect to the commerce and the industries of the country. The failure of Congress to give heed to the manifest relation of trust organization to transportation throughout the early period; the failure of Congress to broaden and strengthen the law of 1887 when its weakness became apparent, making it represent the full constitutional power of the Federal Government; the failure of Congress to repair even its fatal defects when plainly pointed out by the Supreme Court and the Commission, makes the mortifying recital of the next period in this history.

Contemporaneous with the history of thirty years' struggle for rate regulation is the history of the insidious growth of trusts and a single legislative attempt to cope with the resulting evils independent of railroad legislation.

There was a trust investigation in 1875–76 that revealed a suggestion of the truth with respect to the criminal compact between Standard Oil and the railroads. It was shown that John D. Rockefeller and his associates, aided by alliance with the transportation lines running through the oil regions, were crushing opposition and laying the foundation for the most powerful monopoly in the world.

The testimony of the Congressional committee of 1876, the Hepburn committee of 1879, the Senate committee of 1885, the House committees of 1888 and 1893, all demonstrated the evil nature of the alliance of the railroads with Standard Oil, with the beef, and with the coal combine. From 80 to 100 bills were introduced in Congress, but they did not get beyond the committees to which they were referred. Driven to cover and the exercise of greater caution by the partial exposure of their criminal methods, reorganizations were effected by the growing monopolies, names were changed, and public indignation was quieted.

But by 1890 it had become apparent that powerful influences were at work in the business world destroying equality of opportunity. Markets and prices were disturbed and established business enterprises forced out of the field. The public began to understand that combinations were forming, that trust organizations were being effected in many lines of production, and that these organizations were suppressing competition.

The current literature of that time makes interesting reading to-day. It was charged on the one hand that the trust was the offspring of the tariff. It was declared upon the other that the trust was a progressive business evolution, a legitimate effort to cheapen production. Two great national campaigns were waged mainly upon the issue that the tariff was the mother of trust and combination.

In the meantime a national statute had been enacted which was aimed at the trust and combination as an independent conspiracy. The lesson of the Standard Oil, the beef, and coal alliance with transportation seemed well-nigh forgotten. The Sherman Act was the work of a statesman and would have aided greatly if its violations had been vigorously prosecuted. But it was made apparent very early that the root of the evil can not be reached by striking at the trusts alone. It is the railroads in combination with the trusts that constitutes the great problem.

FAILURE OF INTERSTATE-COMMERCE LAW.

In May, 1897, the Supreme Court in the Maximum Rate case decided that it was not the intent of the interstate-commerce law to invest the Commission with authority to enforce its determination with respect to rates. This reduced the Commission merely to a body authorized to hear complaints, take testimony, and make recommendations. The legislative intent as determined by the court is not questioned. The fact remains, however, that many who participated in the legislation—the Commission, the railroads, and the public—understood that authority to supervise rates and to issue orders and decrees with respect to what a rate should be was conferred upon the Commission at the time the law was enacted.

This statement is of value at this time only as bearing upon the scope of the authority to be conferred upon the Commission by this Congress, the intent of which, it is hoped, will be made so clear as to leave nothing to require construction.

The first Interstate Commerce Commission, Judge Thomas M. Cooley, chairman, construed the law as giving to it supervision over rates and authority to issue orders as to what a rate should be. The first case decided after the Commission organized, the Walla Walla Grain case, in the decision of which Judge Cooley participated, placed this construction upon the law.

During the entire time that he continued as a member of the Commission and long thereafter the Commission construed the law in like manner as to all cases raising that issue.

The Commission in its annual report for 1897 thus states the fact with respect to the exercise of this supposed power:

> The Commission exercised this power in a case commenced in the second month after its organization and continued to exercise it for a period of more than ten years, during which time no member of the Commission ever officially questioned the existence of such authority or failed to join in its exercise.

It was so accepted by the railroads, and for years the question was not even raised. That the interstate-commerce act for a time exerted a wholesome influence upon carriers and shippers and, in a measure, checked the upbuilding of monopoly through discriminations the public was certainly led to believe. There was a show of compliance with the law following its enactment. But it soon became apparent that the practices prohibited by the law were being resumed. Passes were issued to favored individuals, rebates were again granted, substitutions for rebates were resorted to, and discriminations practiced in various ways.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF 1897.

In its report for 1897, after reviewing the result of this decision and those which had preceded it, each one further reducing its efficiency, the Commission presented the unfortunate situation as follows:

> There is to-day, and there can be under the law as now interpreted, no effective regulation of interstate carriers. If there is to be under this act it must be amended. From the best considerations we have been able to give the subject, we believe that the most essential features of such an act must be those previously enacted. A tribunal which regulates the common carriers by railroad of interstate traffic, which can stand for justice and fairness between these carriers and the people, must have the power to fix a maximum rate, to fix in certain instances a minimum rate, and its orders when made must mean something.

After carefully reviewing the decision of the court which denied to the Commission the right to continue in the exercise of the powers of regulation theretofore exercised, the Commission made careful and specific recommendations in its report for 1897 for the amendment of the act. It was recommended that the act be so amended as to empower the Commission to call in question any rate or charge, and issue an order upon the carrier, either upon its own motion or upon a complaint being made to the Commission to appear and "to show cause why said rate shall not be held to be unreasonable or otherwise in violation of law," and on such order and notification to the carrier to have a "full hearing." The amendment as proposed goes on to provide what I shall read.

I beg the attention of Senators here to what I shall now quote. It is the specific recommendation of this Commission as to what it is necessary for Congress to do if we are so to amend the law of 1887 as to regulate railway rates and practices. I read from the report of the Commission for 1897:

> If the Commission is of the opinion that the rates, fares, or charges as filed and published, or the classification, facilities, and regulations published in connection therewith are unreasonable or otherwise in violation of law, it shall determine what are and shall be reasonable and otherwise lawful rates and fares, charges, classifications * * * and shall prescribe the same and shall order the carriers to file and publish schedules in accordance with such decision.

And such orders were to be enforcible under the penalties provided in section 16 of the act. And it was further proposed to be provided that on full hearing the Commission could make any further reduction in such rates.

It was further proposed to amend the act in section 15, to provide that if, after a full hearing—

> It is determined that any carrier is in violation of the provisions of this act, the Commission shall make an order directing such carrier to cease and desist from such further violation, and shall prescribe in such order the thing which the carrier is required to do or not to do for the future to bring itself into conformity with the provisions of this act; and in so doing it shall have power—
> (a) To fix a maximum rate covering the entire cost of the service;
> (b) To fix both a maximum and a minimum rate when that may be necessary to prevent discrimination under the third section; * * *
> (d) To make changes in classification;
> (e) To so amend the rules and regulations under which the traffic moves as to bring them into conformity with the provisions of this act.

These are the recommendations of the Commission in 1897, ten years after it was established. With a decade of experience the Commission well understood what powers were vitally essential to an effective administration of the law. The authority to do these specific things they declared to be necessary if there was to be a regulation of railway rates and railway services.

This was, indeed, an urgent appeal. It seems well-nigh incredible that it should have failed to meet approval in either branch of the National Legislature.

COMMISSION'S RECOMMENDATIONS AUTHORITATIVE.

Mr. President, the Interstate Commerce Commission has, I believe, ever since that body was first organized, been composed of men distinguished for their ability, learning, and special fitness. Without exception they have been men of the highest character. I believe that they have been fearless and impartial in the discharge of official obligation. They are the appointees of Democratic and Republican Administrations. The Senate has consented to and approved their selection. The task of the Commission has been from the beginning a most arduous one. Dealing with great and complex interests, it constitutes a branch of the official service which enjoys the esteem and confidence of the American public. Bringing to the charge of official duty a varied training and experience, concentrating every faculty of thoroughly disciplined minds upon the questions involved in the regulation of interstate commerce of this great nation, it could not fail to become easily the highest authority in the special field of its employment.

Mr. President, the gifted and distinguished Senator from Texas, in support of his amendment to take from inferior courts the right to suspend by preliminary injunction the rates fixed by the Commission, urged that the expert knowledge of the Commissioners, acquired by constant application to all of the problems of transportation, made their judgment with respect to the reasonableness of the rates superior to that of the court. I think all who heard him were compelled to agree with that contention.

That which is true of the Commission's ability to judge wisely with respect to rates in the trial of a particular case is equally true with respect to all of the duties which they are constantly called upon to discharge. But, Mr. President, above all things is it true that the Commissioners are best able to judge wisely with respect to the law itself which they are called upon to administer. They go patiently through with every case, from the filing of the complaint to the final judgment rendered upon the record, and must consider well the law with respect to its every phase. They must study every section and sentence of the statute day after day and year after year; they hear it discussed and dissected and expounded by the able lawyers for the complainant and by the learned counsel of the greatest railroad corporations in the world.

Of all men they ought to be the ones best able to submit recommendations to Congress with respect to changes in the law; if it is defective, to point out the defects; if its faults can be remedied, to suggest the remedy. Their recommendations are without prejudice or bias. We can take them as we would the unanimous opinion of the judges of the Supreme Bench with regard to the faults and weaknesses and injustice of any law which the court is called upon to construe. Indeed the Commission has this advantage: Any court must hear many cases and pass upon different statutes; the Commission deals every day with the same law and with its relation to the same subject.

For these reasons the statesmen who framed the interstate-commerce law in 1887 provided:

> That the Commission shall, on or before the 1st day of December in each year, make a report, which shall be transmitted to Congress, copies of which shall be distributed as are other reports transmitted to Congress. This report shall contain such information and data collected by the Commission as may be considered of value to the determination of questions connected with the regulation of Commerce—> together with such recommendations as to additional legislation relating thereto as the Commission may deem necessary.

Congress therefore laid its commands upon the Commission to recommend legislation, the need for which should become apparent to them in administering the duties of their office.

RECOMMENDATIONS IGNORED.

Mr. President, I now call the attention of the Senate to the fact that these important recommendations have been urged again and again, and that they have been ignored by Congress year after year.

Congress having failed to act upon the recommendation of the Commission in 1897, to correct the defects of the law as shown by the Maximum Rate Case, the Commission again urged action upon those same recommendations in the report for 1898, saying:

> There is now no power, in the judgment of the Commission or in the judgment of the court, to restrain a railroad company from demanding and receiving unreasonable and unjust charges.

They said further:

> The power of establishing or fixing reasonable rates in advance is the only practical legal remedy for extortion and unreasonable and unjust charges.

In this report reference is made to the report of the previous year in the following language:

> We have not only set forth in general terms the necessity for amending the law, but have formulated and proposed the specific amendments which appear to us positively essential. With the renewal of these recommendations, no duty of the Commission in this regard remains undischarged.

Congress having failed to act upon this recommendation, the Commission, in its report for 1899, said:

Every consideration of private justice and public welfare demands that railway rates shall be reasonable, uniform to all shippers, and equitable between all communities. Until needful legislation is supplied that demand must remain unsatisfied.

Reference is made in this report to the recommendations previously made, the many indorsements of them received from agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial interests throughout the country, to which the Commission adds:

It is sufficient to say that the existing situation and developments of the past year render more imperative than ever before the necessity for speedy and suitable legislation. We therefore renew the recommendations heretofore made and earnestly urge their early consideration and adoption.

Congress having failed to act upon this recommendation, the Commission in its report for 1900 said:

The requests of the Commission for needful amendments have been supported by petitions and memorials from agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial interests throughout the country, yet not a line of the statute has been changed, and none of the burdensome conditions which called for relief have been removed or modified.

They say further in this report:

With reference to further legislation, the Commission has little to suggest, and nothing new to propose. * * * Recommendations, both general and specific, have been repeatedly made. The views heretofore officially expressed are believed to be justified alike by experience and reflection. They are confirmed by later and current observation.

Congress having failed to act upon this recommendation, in 1901 the Commission, in its report, urges again the amendments previously recommended, and adds:

The reasons for urging these amendments have been carefully explained, and repetition of the arguments at this time can hardly be expected. * * * Knowledge of the present conditions and tendencies increases rather than lessens the necessity of legislative action upon the lines already indicated, and in such other directions as will furnish an adequate and reasonable statute for the regulation of commerce among the several States.

Congress having failed to act upon this recommendation in 1902, after discussing the defects in the law, the Commission in its report for that year said:

The fullest power of correction is placed in the Congress and the exercise of that power is demanded by the highest consideration of public welfare. * * * If the representations already made do not induce favorable action, it is certainly not the fault of the Commission. * * * A sense of the wrongs and injustice which can not be prevented in the present state of the law, as well as the duty enjoined by the act itself, impels the Commission to reaffirm its recommendations, for the reasons so often and so fully set forth in previous reports, and before the Congressional committees.

Mr. President, it is worth while to pause here and note the warning that appeared in this recommendation of the Interstate Commerce Commission to the Congress and to the country, that the railroads were combining and the situation was growing more and more serious.

Moreover, in view of the rapid disappearance of railway competition, and the maintenance of rates established by combination, attended as they are by substantial advance in the charges on many articles of household necessity, the Commission regards this matter as increasingly grave, and desires to emphasize its conviction that the safeguards required for the protection of the public will not be provided until the regulating statute is thoroughly revised.

Still Congress failed to act upon these recommendations. It passed the Elkins law to provide against departures from the published rate. But it did nothing to give the Commission power to protect the commerce of the country against rapidly advancing rates.

At the beginning of the next session, in December, 1903, after referring to the Elkins law (passed February 19 preceding) at some length in its report, the Commission says:

It (the Elkins law) has added nothing whatever to the power of the Commission to correct a tariff rate which is unreasonably high or which operates with discriminating effect. It greatly aids the observance of tariff charges, but it affords no remedy for those who are injured by such charges, either when they are excessive or when they are inequitably adjusted. If the tariffs, published and filed as the law directs, are enforced against the shippers alike, the authority of the Commission to require such tariffs to be changed remains just as ineffectual as it was before this legislation was enacted. This is the point to which the attention of Congress has been repeatedly called. This is the defect in the regulating statute which demands correction. In previous reports this question has been frequently and fully discussed. We have commented at length upon the weakness and inadequacy of the law as its provisions have been construed by the courts. We have carefully pointed out the amendments which we deem essential, and explained in detail the reasons for our recommendations. We are unable to add anything of value to the presentation heretofore made. Our duty in this regard has been performed.

Attention is again called to the recommendations previously made, and these are reaffirmed. The need of this legislation is said to be all the more imperative as an indirect result of the Elkins law. The Commission says:

The effect of that legislation in many cases was to bring about an increase of railroad charges.

Again in 1904 the Commission reiterated its recommendations and renewed its warning; the previous discussions of the "weakness and inadequacy" of the interstate-commerce law are again recalled, and former "urgent recommendations" are once more cited to the attention of Congress. The enormous advances in freight rates as set forth in the reports for 1902 and 1903 are again cited as additional considerations calling for the enactment of these oft-repeated recommendations.

Congress having failed to act upon these recommendations, at the beginning of the present session in 1905, the Commission said, with respect to the granting of power to fix future rates:

We deem it unnecessary to discuss this question in the present report further than to reaffirm the facts heretofore expressed.

Mr. President, I have quoted from nine annual reports made by this Commission, each clear and explicit in its terms; each portraying the fatal weaknesses of the law; each strongly appealing for amendment to cure the defects. These nine reports have been issued since the decision of the Supreme Court rendered the Commission absolutely powerless to restrain a railway company from demanding and receiving unreasonable and unjust charges. These reports came from a body of men, each of whom the Senate had joined in selecting to administer the law and to recommend needed amendments from time to time. Until a few days ago I never understood why Congress had failed to act upon the important recommendations and the urgent appeals made year after year by the Commission for the repair of this broken-down statute. But it has been made plain at last. It was disclosed during the debate upon the 22d of March, when the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] propounded the following question to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]:

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator [Mr. LODGE] whether he bears in mind the fact that the original interstate-commerce act calls upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to make recommendations to Congress from time to time in regard to legislation?

Mr. LODGE. I had forgotten that they were called upon to make recommendations to Congress.

Here we have at last a possible explanation for the failure of Congress through all these years to legislate some vitality into the interstate-commerce act. Congress, like the Senator from Massachusetts, must have forgotten that the law required the Commission to make recommendations. It must have forgotten the existence of the Commission. Is it strange that with nine years of failure on the part of Congress to respond to these recommendations the Commission should, through magazines, the press, and the platform, address itself from time to time to the public in an effort to awaken Congress from its deep sleep?

But, sir, even if Senators, and indeed the entire Congress had forgotten that the Commission was required to make recommendations, even though it had forgotten its recommendations, and the very existence of the Commission, there were other reasons why it should have taken action upon this subject.

Soon after the decision of 1897, petitions, memorials, and resolutions, urging Congress to amend the interstate-commerce law and clothe the Commission with power to regulate rates, came pouring in upon the Congress from agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial interests throughout the country. State legislatures from every section of the country solemnly memoralized Congress upon the subject.

THE PRESIDENT URGES CONGRESS TO ACT.

The President of the United States had not forgotten that it was the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to recommend legislation. He had not forgotten the purpose of the act of 1887, and in his message to the Congress in December, 1901—away back four years ago—he said:

The cardinal provisions of that act were that railway rates should be just and reasonable and that all shippers, localities, and commodities should be accorded equal treatment.

He had evidently read and reflected upon the important recommendations made year after year by the Commission, for in this same message he said:

This act should be amended. The railway is a public servant. Its rates should be just to and open to all shippers alike. The Government should see to it, that within its jurisdiction, this is so, and should provide a speedy, inexpensive, and effective remedy to that end.

He waited three years for the Congress to act, and then in his message in December, 1904, after a general discussion of the subject, he said:

In my judgment the most important legislative act now needed, as regards the regulation of corporations, is this act to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to revise rates and regulations, the revised rate to at once go into effect and stay in effect unless and until the court of review reverses it.

Another year passed by. No law was enacted enlarging the authority of the Commission and conferring upon it power to revise rates and regulations. At the beginning of the present session, December, 1905, the President again reminded Congress of its duty to the public. He presented the relation of the railway problem to the control of transportation, and reiterated the urgency for prompt action in the following words:

As I said in my message of December 6 last, the immediate and most pressing need, so far as legislation is concerned, is the enactment into law of some scheme to secure to the agents of the Government such supervision of the rates charged by the railroads of the country, engaged in interstate traffic, and shall summarily and effectively prevent the imposition of unjust and unreasonable rates. It must include putting a complete stop to rebates in every shape and form.

Mr. President, I believe that the recommendations of the Interstate Commerce Commission should have the greatest weight with Congress, and should be followed in framing a law, unless there are controlling reasons for their rejection.

I believe that the failure to enact into law the recommendations of the Commission made and repeated year after year for a long decade has cost the American people hundreds of millions of dollars in excessive transportation charges, and hundreds of millions of dollars in the increased cost of trust-made articles, the monopoly element of which the railroads have conferred upon the trusts. This increased burden has fallen with the greatest weight upon the humbler homes, where the increased expense of living has made havoc with the savings of the family.

I believe that the recommendations of the Commission enacted into law, together with legislation logically corollary, followed by an appropriation of the money necessary to vigorous enforcement, would have preserved industrial independence for this generation of men.

INDUSTRIAL CONSOLIDATION.

What are the industrial conditions with which the nation is confronted to-day? What are the results of the failure of Congress to act in accordance with its power and its obligation? Great evils grow out of small beginnings. The railroads began by despising their common-law obligations to treat all shippers alike. They despised small traffic transactions. They were bound to have tonnage, more tonnage, bigger tonnage. They openly bought tonnage with rebates. They preferred to transact business with a few large shippers. They drove out the small dealers with advancing rates, forced them into retirement and turned their business over to the trusts.

To this end they were ready to defy State and Federal authority. They recognized one law, a law of their own making—the law of combination. Denied the right to pool by the interstate-commerce act they made traffic agreements to nullify the statute. Denied the right to make traffic agreements by the courts they nullified the decisions by combinations. They absorbed the small companies. They gathered their roads into trunk lines, the trunk lines into systems, the systems into great groups.

In order to convey some idea of the enormous combinations which have been formed in the railway world and of the unlimited power thereby centered in the hands of a few individuals, the following statement is submitted. The figures in this case are mostly taken from Moody's Manual of Railroads, a recognized authority:

The six great groups.

Classification.	Number of roads embraced.	Mileage of each group.	Capitalization of each group.
Vanderbilt group	132	21,868	$1,109,132,132
Pennsylvania group	280	19,300	1,822,402,235
Morgan-Hill group	225	47,206	2,265,116,359
Gould-Rockefeller group	109	28,157	1,368,877,540
Moore-Leeds group	91	25,092	1,059,250,939
Harriman-Kuehn-Loeb group	85	22,943	1,321,243,711
Total	922	164,586	9,006,068,916
Allied systems	250	13,721	380,277,000
Total under control	1,172	178,307	9,386,363,916

We have here nearly 90 per cent of the vital railway mileage of the country controlled by six sets of financiers, with an identity of interest which at will signifies practically a single control. No one can be so blind as not to see the purpose and the certain result of this consolidation. The country has been partitioned and apportioned among these great groups. Each group dominates in its own territory. With agreements as to classifications, rates, and divisions of traffic, the railway business ceased to be a competitive business. It has become a monopoly in fact, controlling the course and destination of transportation and its tolls and charges on all interstate commerce and on all State commerce excepting where interfered with by State control.

The transportation companies built up the great industrial trusts through transportation agreements. Their identification now became more pronounced. They became partners in interest. The railroads acquired ownership in the trusts. The trusts acquired ownership in the railroads. Coal, oil, iron, steel, shipping, telegraph, express, gas, beef, food products, and, indeed, the whole field of industrial production came rapidly into combination and unity of interest. They did not stop here. Banking, insurance, in fact the whole commercial system, was centralized. Less than one hundred men officered, controlled, and directed throughout the entire field. The identity of ownership could be seen in the appearance and reappearance of the same names, some in one group, some in another, massing and knitting together its vast organization. This was the inevitable result of turning over the highways to the common carriers unrestrained. Combination was bound to breed its own kind.

Are special instances required to sustain this conclusion? Is it necessary to review the history of the Standard Oil, coal, iron, beef, the grain, and elevator combines, each represented in railroad ownership? The records of courts, Congressional, and legislative investigation furnish abundant and enduring testimony of their crimes against the American people. They stand out against the dark background of thirty years of railroad history a menace and a reproach to government. They are but types of a whole army of railroad-made and railroad-fostered trusts.

Because of recent disclosures the sugar trust is of interest at this time, and furnishes a conspicuous example, illustrating the relation of the trust to railroad transportation.

Mr. John Moody, of New York City, recognized as an authority by those trading in trust and railroad stocks and securities, two years ago classified the trusts of the country as follows: The greater industrial trusts, the lesser industrial trusts, the franchise trusts, and the great railway groups.

The greater and lesser industrial trusts, comprising the most important industrial trusts in the United States, two years ago numbered 318 separate trust organizations, representing the consolidation of 5,288 plants or manufacturing establishments, with a total stock and bond issue of $7,246,342,533. These consolidations dominate practically every field of industrial enterprise in the United States, from the manufacture of railroad locomotives and pressed-steel cars to matches and chewing gum. Of the greater industrial trusts, all have been organized or reorganized since April 1, 1890. With the exception of the sugar trust, all were incorporated in the State of New Jersey.

The sugar trust was incorporated in its present form in 1901. It has acquired ownership or control of 55 corporations, representing 70 to 90 per cent of the entire sugar-refining industry of this country. The element of monopoly in this organization is very powerful, consisting of tariff benefits and practical control of the sources of raw material. It is capitalized at $145,000,000. Although this is vastly more than the investment represented, its virtual control of the market enables the trust to earn dividends averaging about 12 per cent on its capitalization. For fifteen years since it was organized the sugar trust has paid dividends ranging from 7 to 12½ per cent. The dividends actually earned during these years have been much higher than this, but the management have latterly adopted the policy of paying directly as dividends a modest 7 per cent. This course was prompted by the fear that the public patience would not endure the high prices on sugar necessary to pay the extravagant dividends which are actually being exacted from consumers upon the millions of dollars of watered stock in the trust.

Protected by the tariff from competition with foreign refineries the sugar trust is placed in a position of immense commercial advantage. With the aid of the transportation lines it is invested with an absolute monopoly, enabling it to control the prices upon this article of daily use in every home and tax every table at will.

On the 7th of February, 1906, Congressman WILLIAM R. HEARST submitted to the Department of Justice of the Federal Government sworn complaints charging a compact between the sugar trust and officers of the Pennsylvania, New York Central, the Delaware, Lacawanna and Western, the Philadelphia and Reading, the New York, New Haven and Hartford and several other railroad companies. Mr. HEARST has placed in the hands of the Attorney-General such an array of facts in support of his complaints that the Government has asked for the indictment of the head of the sugar trust and some of the most prominent railroad officials controlling nearly all of the trunk lines east of the Mississippi River.

In the case of the United States v. Armour & Co. et al.,

lately tried before Judge Humphrey at Chicago, Attorney-General Moody, in the course of his argument, said:

> Not long ago the enterprise of the proprietor of one of the New York papers discovered much information which tended to show that all the great trunk lines running out of New York City had been practicing discrimination in the form of rebates to the American Sugar Refining Company. With what I believe was rare self-denial and a high sense of public duty that evidence was offered to the Department of Justice. Out of it charges have grown against the railroads and against the sugar company, and they are now under consideration by the grand jury. I express no opinion whether the charges are true or false, there are ways of deciding that question when the time shall come. These rebates, amounting in the aggregate to hundreds of thousands of dollars, have been often given to the sugar company to aid it in its fight with the farmers who are conducting the struggling industry of producing sugar from beets. When the sugar company wanted to overcome the competition of the farmer, wanted to lay such stress upon him that he would give up the contest in despair and dispose of his property to the monopoly, it went to the railroads and borrowed a club by which it clubbed the farmer to death.

Let it not be supposed for one moment that the payment of rebates imposes any burden upon the railroad company. Whatever sums of money are necessary to enable the sugar trust to maintain its advantage over competitors and to aid in paying extravagant dividends costs the railroad company nothing. It is all taken out of the consumers and enough more with it to swell railroad surplus and pay profits on its inflated capitalization as well. For proof of this turn to the rate schedules of the railroad companies, and it will be found that they have increased transportation charges upon this article of prime necessity more than five and one-half million dollars since 1897.

Again and again the Interstate Commerce Commission, in their reports to Congress, called attention in unmistakable language to existing conditions and their helplessness under the law as construed by the court.

I quote the following from the report of the Commission of 1899:

> It is a matter of common knowledge that vast schemes of railway control are now in process of consummation and that competition of rival lines is to be restrained by these combinations. * * * If the plans already foreshadowed are brought to effective results and others of similar scope are carried to execution, there will be a vast centralization of railroad properties, with all the power involved in such far-reaching combinations yet uncontrolled by any public authority which can be efficiently exerted. The restraints of competition upon excessive and unjust rates in this way are avoided, and whatever evils may result will be remediless under existing laws.

In its report for 1900 the Commission says:

> One of the striking features of recent times in the industrial world has been the tendency to combine for the purpose of limiting or eliminating competition. In no branch of industry probably is the inducement to promote combinations of this sort greater nor the advantage to be hoped for from them more certain than in railway operations. * * * We should, however, hardly discharge our duty in a report to Congress upon the railway operations of this country if we did not call attention to these combinations and the effect which they are likely to produce.

In January, 1901, the Commission said in its report to Congress:

> More instructive than any argument are the results of an investigation just made at Chicago into the movement of packing-house products, a more detailed account of which hereafter appears. The facts developed upon that investigation, and upon a previous investigation into the movement of grain and grain products, which is also referred to later, are of such a character that no thoughtful person can contemplate them with indifference. That the leading traffic officials of many of the principal railway lines, men occupying high positions and charged with the most important duties, should deliberately violate the statute law of the land, and in some cases agree with each other to do so; that it should be thought by them necessary to destroy vouchers and to so manipulate bookkeeping as to obliterate evidence of the transactions; that hundreds of thousands of dollars should be paid in unlawful rebates to a few great packing houses; that the business of railroad transportation, the most important but one in the country to-day, paying the highest salaries and holding out to young men the greatest inducements, should to such an extent be conducted in open disregard of law, must be surprising and offensive to all right-minded persons. Equally startling at least is the fact that the owners of these packing houses, men whose names are known throughout the commercial world, should seemingly be eager to augment their gains with the enormous amounts of these rebates which they receive in plain defiance of a Federal statute. These facts carry their own comment, and nothing said by us can add to their significance.
> The effect is to give these large packers an enormous advantage over their small competitors. * * * Already these competitors have, in the main, ceased to exist.
> We find in these disclosures a pregnant illustration of the manner in which secret concessions are tending to build up great trusts and monopolies at the expense of the small, independent operator.

In 1902 the Commission said in its report to Congress:

> The tendency to combine continues to be the most significant feature of railway development. The facts in this regard are matters of common knowledge, and little is gained by the mention of particular instances. * * * A law which might have answered the purpose when competition was relied upon to secure reasonable rates is demonstrably inadequate when that competition is displaced by the most far-reaching and powerful combinations. So great a change in conditions calls for corresponding change in the regulating statute.

THE HEPBURN-DOLLIVER BILL.

And so, Mr. President, after all these years of legislative delay demoralizing private business and imposing grievous burdens upon the country, we are at last offered the Hepburn-Dolliver bill. Does it meet the requirements of the country's commerce? Does it promise a remedy? Let us examine its provisions.

Mr. President, this bill will not solve the transportation problem. Unless greatly strengthened, it will not meet the expectations of the country. It will not dispose of the question.

Why should we temporize? Why should we approach this subject on tiptoe, with apology to special interests and apostrophe to property rights? Honest wealth needs no guaranty of security in this country. Property rightfully acquired does not beget fear—it fosters independence, confidence, courage. Property which is the fruit of plunder feels insecure. It is timid. It is quick to cry for help. It is ever proclaiming the sacredness of vested rights. The thief can have no vested rights in stolen property. I resent the assumption that the great wealth of this country is only safe when the millionaires are on guard. Property rights are not the special charge of the owners of great fortune. Even the poor may be relied upon to protect property. They have so little—the little they possess is so precious—that they are easily enlisted to defend the rights of property.

No one here need offer himself as a martyr to protect the property of railway corporations against the results of popular clamor. Property rights are safe. The ample power of the Constitution is the everlasting bulwark of property rights. We can do nothing if we would to put the property of any corporation in the slightest jeopardy. We shall do well indeed if we prevent the railway company from wronging the citizen. If we will use all the power we have under the Constitution, we may compel the carrier to desist from acts which encroach upon the rights of the citizen and community. We shall not be able to do more than that. We ought to be willing to do that much.

Thirty years of experience, thirty years of struggle for legislation, thirty years of judicial decision plead with us, and yet we make no advance. The committees of Congress spend a decade listening to appeals, filing away petitions, taking testimony, hearing arguments, traveling over the same ground session after session. In the meantime individuals are wronged by extortionate rates and their business handed over to monopolies enjoying the favor of the railroads. Towns and cities, with natural advantages and locations to make them commercial centers, are discriminated against to build up great markets and railway terminals at the end of the long haul.

Men have grown gray in this protracted struggle to free the commercial highways from tyranny and bring the railroads of the country back to their legitimate business as common carriers. Weary and heartsore they accept this bill, not because it is fair and just and goes to the core of the trouble, but, as they declare, "Because it is all we can get now. It is as far as Congress will go."

I think it is demonstrated that every man charged with any official responsibility with respect to this legislation owes it as a public duty to go to the limit of constitutional power in clothing the Government with authority to regulate railway rates and railway services.

Mr. President, the bill before the Senate does not measure the importance of the subject to which it relates. The junior Senator from Iowa, whose share in the framing of this bill authorizes him to speak for its scope, directed attention in his eloquent address to "the three conspicuous propositions with which this measure is concerned."

First. Broadening the meaning of the word "transportation" to include independent car lines and refrigerator companies "by requiring that every charge incident to the service shall be reckoned as a part of the public rate."

Second. By authorizing the Commission "where complaint is made that a rate is unreasonable or unduly preferential to require the carrier to observe as a maximum in such a case the rate which, in its judgment, is in conformity with law."

Third. Requiring "a detailed report of the business of the railways compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to conform their systems of accounts to the regulations made by the Commission and to keep them open to reasonable inspection under public authority."

Excepting, then, as this bill provides for the new device of the private car and refrigerator companies, it goes no further than to patch up the rents made by judicial decision and clarify and strengthen the section relating to the keeping of railway accounts, and reporting thereon. Hence it may be said that this bill is a measure to correct the blunders of 1887.

Sir, it took thirteen long years of persistent and earnest effort to enact the statute of 1887. It is nine years since judicial decision took from that statute every element of protection which it had afforded the commerce of the country. The bill before us offers no more in fact—indeed less than did the McCrary bill, the first measure which passed the House of Representatives for the regulation of interstate commerce in 1874.

We have made some progress: We better comprehend now the consequences of handing over the commerce of the country to the control of railway corporations than we did then. It is for this reason, I repeat, that this bill does not measure the importance of the subject to which it relates. The lesson which we have learned in the last generation of time is that the control of transportation is the control of commerce; that the control of commerce is the control of the commercial and industrial life of the American people; that the control of the commercial and industrial life of the American people is the control of their commercial and industrial freedom; that the control of their commercial and industrial freedom is the control of their political freedom; that this question, in its final analysis, goes to the integrity of our free institutions.

I do not disparage this bill in its present form. I credit it with everything it can accomplish. It is fair to say that it will aid directly and indirectly to equalize rates; that it will afford opportunity for associations and municipal organizations representing communities where rates are higher than more favored localities to apply, on that ground, for relief. This will, in a limited way, result in some reductions. I say in a limited way, because only the larger, wealthier, more enterprising and aggressive communities will be represented by active organizations with the courage and the means to make a fight against the railroads for better rates. It will be further limited by the fundamental defect in the plan which provides no way of ascertaining the reasonable rate, but only the comparatively reasonable rate, as I shall presently show.

But beyond this the larger shippers will derive the principal benefit from the bill if it is enacted in its present form. As a class they are mainly interested in equal rates for all shippers within the zone of competition. They are quite indifferent as to the amount of the rate, because in the end they do not pay it. While their complaints would undoubtedly result in some incidental reductions, they will not be filed with the Commission primarily for that purpose.

I protest that this is not a bill for the great body of the American people who constitute the consumers of the country. They do not buy freight of the railway companies at all. It has been suggested that the railroads have good cause to resent the designation of their charges as taxes upon the people. But they are taxes.

There are just and unjust taxes. Any excessive charges for the transportation of the necessaries of life should be as carefully guarded against as unjust taxes for sustaining government. The Government is as truly obligated to protect the people from unjust freight charges as it is from unjust taxes to sustain the Government. Consumers do not deal directly with the carrier, and yet they pay practically all of the fifteen hundred millions collected by the railway companies annually for carrying the freight of the country. They pay this freight when they buy coal, lumber, clothing, and other supplies of the local dealer and merchant. The consumer does not know how much of the cost is a freight charge. He does know that prices are steadily advancing. He feels the increasing burden. He is certain that some one is wronging him. He believes that the railroads are directly responsible for a part of it and indirectly responsible for all of it. He wants relief. What does this bill do for him?

He can not make complaint in his own behalf. He has not the detailed knowledge upon which to base such complaint. The items of overcharge, if he could specify them, are small, but in the aggregate they are important to him. He could not afford to institute proceedings for reduction if he were able to formulate the specific allegations of a complaint.

If the legislation enacted at this session is to go no further than an endeavor to secure equal rates and not reasonable rates, then it ought to be so framed that there is some one upon whom rests an official obligation to act for the helpless consumer, for the millions who pay the freight. We should at least make an effort to secure equal rates for them until such time as we may secure reasonable rates for all.

So long as the Commission, under the law of 1887, exercised the power of enforcing orders with respect to rates, which the railroads and the public understood the law conferred upon them, they issued and enforced such orders on investigations instituted upon complaints filed with them, and likewise upon investigations instituted upon their own motion. One of the most important cases ever decided by the Commission, resulting in a reduction of rates upon foodstuffs, was upon an investigation prosecuted by the Commission upon its own motion.

This bill limits the Commission's authority to make a determination and issue an order to cases upon complaint.

Section 13 of the law of 1887 authorizes the Commission to institute an inquiry upon its own motion. This bill allows that to stand, but in section 15, as proposed to be amended by this bill, it does not authorize the Commission to make a determination and issue an order upon an investigation which it has conducted upon its own motion under authority of section 13. If it is wise to continue the authority of the Commission to make investigation, why is it deemed advisable to withhold from it the power to remedy any wrong disclosed by such investigation?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Consultation with the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission has led me to believe that with their power of investigating general rate conditions throughout the country, if they discover an abuse they will be under no inconvenience whatever under the provisions of section 15 in founding a proper complaint.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I noticed in the discussion in the House of Representatives that the member from one of the Maine districts raised that question and objected that there were provisions in this bill which might be so construed as to allow the Commission to issue an order upon the investigation which it had made on its own motion under section 13. I observed that a member of the House committee which framed the bill promptly declared that such construction could not be given to it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I think the Senator from Wisconsin will agree with me that if we can secure an adjudication of every complaint that may be filed, we will have gone a long way toward curing, or at least securing jurisdiction of, most railroad abuses.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am sorry to disagree with my friend the Senator from Iowa. I think we shall have gone only a very little way. Under the provisions of this bill I do not think we will go to the heart of this problem at all. I believe I shall be able to make this very clear, if Senators have the patience to hear me to the end.

If consumers are to be greatly benefited by securing even relatively reasonable rates, it would seem very clear that either the Commission should be authorized to act upon its own motion or the Government should provide some agency authorized to make preliminary investigation into the wrongs suffered by the consumers, file complaints, and prosecute the same before the Commission. Some communities and rural sections might, thus aided, secure at least a moiety of relief.

The whole history of this struggle for legislation, reaching back more than a score of years, reveals the fact that those who are strong through the power of organization and wealth fare the best.

Mr. President, it is on this broad ground of a just protection of public interest that the proposed bill seems to me narrow and far below the level demanded by experienced and enlightened public judgment. It is only designed to be amendatory of the law passed twenty years ago. In some respects it is less effective than the original law was believed to be by those who enacted it—by the public and railroad companies as well.

I will say, however, that in its amendments to section 20, with respect to the publicity of railroad accounts, I entirely and unreservedly commend it. It contains excellent provisions for the inspecting of railway accounts and for greater publicity concerning them. But, excepting as to private car companies and a limited provision with respect to relative rates and orders, it ignores the lessons of experience and fails to recognize the existing commercial and industrial conditions. It stands and "marks time" on the old camp ground of twenty years ago.

Sir, the bill takes little heed of the recommendations of the Interstate Commerce Commission to be found recorded in their annual reports to Congress. These recommendations are the result of nearly twenty years of accumulated wisdom in testing the law through administration. They should constitute the most valuable contribution to an intelligent solution of the great problem with which we have to deal.

RECOMMENDATION OF COMMISSION FOR LEGISLATION NOT PROVIDED FOR IN THE PENDING BILL.

I will present some of the more important recommendations for which this bill fails to make provision. I indulge the hope that the imperfections of the bill will be cured by amendment before it passes the Senate.

1. VALUATION OF RAILWAY PROPERTY.

The interstate-commerce law declares all unreasonable rates unlawful. The Supreme Court declares reasonable rates to be such rates as shall afford just compensation to the carrier for the services performed. The Supreme Court has likewise held that "just compensation" is a fair return on the fair value of the railroad property.

The Commission has declared that—

No tribunal upon which the duty may be imposed, whether legislative, administrative, or judicial, can pass a satisfactory judgment upon the reasonableness of railway rates without taking into account the value of railroad property.

In its report for 1903 the Commission recommended Congress to authorize such a valuation to be made, and made an elaborate argument in support of such recommendation.

No such legislation has been enacted by Congress.

This bill makes no provision authorizing the Commission to ascertain the value of railroad property.

I shall endeavor to discuss this most important branch of the subject with some thoroughness before I conclude.

2. THE POWER TO REVISE AND FIX RATES, FARES, AND CHARGES.

The Commission has recommended year after year that it is necessary to the protection of the public that authority be conferred upon the Commission, acting either upon its own motion or upon complaint, to issue, and to enforce an order changing any rates, fares, or charges alleged to be unreasonable or otherwise unlawful after due notice and full hearing, upon a determination by the Commission that the rates, fares, and charges are unreasonable or otherwise unlawful.

The Commission informed Congress that these powers are "positively essential;" that until conferred upon the Commission its "best efforts at regulation must be feeble and disappointing;" that "knowledge of present conditions and tendencies increases rather than lessens the necessity for legislative action upon the lines indicated."

The pending bill does not confer upon the Commission the broad powers to revise rates, fares, and charges upon its own motion, or to fix absolute rates, fares, and charges under any circumstances whatever.

3. THE RELATION OF RATES.

For years extended discussions have been presented to Congress showing the necessity of considering the relation of rates in determining with respect to specific complaints. The reports are full of cases showing how vital this consideration is in the administration of justice.

The Commission has presented with great clearness and power its recommendations that this authority should be reposed in the Commission. Indeed, it is difficult to see how it can proceed to discharge the duties of its high office and dispense any measure of justice under the limitations of the proposed bill, which confers no power upon the Commission to issue orders upon its own motion, unless Congress shall vest it with full authority to pass upon the relation of rates.

This bill makes no provision granting such authority to the Commission.

4. THE CONTROL OF CLASSIFICATION.

The foundation of all rate making lies in classification. Sweeping changes are effected by a single order in classification, which the railroads make from time to time. The Commission has brought to the attention of Congress the fact that "many advances have been brought about by changes in classifications."

Changing the classification of an article of freight changes all the rates under which that article shall be shipped throughout the country. It is wholesale rate making. By comparison the powers proposed by this bill to be conferred on the Commission are only powers of retail rate revision to be exercised only on complaint and on the basis of comparisons with other rates fixed by the railroads.

The Commission has repeatedly recommended that when classifications are filed which the Commission find on investigation and full hearing to be unreasonable, it shall determine what shall be a reasonable classification and prescribe the same, and shall order the carrier or carriers to file and publish, on or before a certain day, schedules in accordance with the decision of the Commission, subject to right of review thereon; that when such classification shall be so established it shall not be departed from without the consent of the Commission upon application of the carrier after due notice and full hearing.

This bill makes no provision conferring such authority upon the Commission.

5. THE POWER TO FIX A MINIMUM RATE.

During the ten years that the Commission exercised their supposed power with respect to rates they found that great injustice resulted in many cases because the railroad companies would readjust rates for competing towns to a common market, so as to defeat the orders of the Commission in securing to a city or community a reasonable opportunity to compete in such common market.

This defect in the law was many times reported to Congress by the Commission and numerous cases cited in support of a recommendation that the Commission be given authority to fix a minimum rate.

This bill makes no provision to correct the law in this important respect.

6. LONG AND SHORT HAUL DISCRIMINATIONS IGNORED.

The long and short haul clause of the act of 1887 was designed to prevent a common form of most oppressive and unwarranted discriminations between places. The court has decided that this clause does not apply when the conditions are not alike at both points between which the discriminations exist. In practice there are no points at which conditions are alike. It lies in the power of the roads to make the conditions dissimilar whenever it suits their purposes. As a result this provision is without effect, and there is no authority in the Commission to prevent any such unwarranted discriminations. Such discriminations prevail generally throughout all sections of the country.

Under the basing-point system a rate to a given point is computed by adding to the rate from the point of origin to the basing point the local rate from the basing point to the point of destination, or an arbitrary amount or a percentage of the rate to the basing point. This is done for points between the point of origin and the basing point, thus making the rate to such points higher than the rate to the basing point beyond. For example, rates on some commodities from New York to Salt Lake are more than twice as high as to San Francisco, a thousand miles farther and over the same line. From New Orleans to Charlotte, N. C., the rates are twice as high as to Virginia cities twice as far distant, the Virginia traffic passing through Charlotte. Most absurd discriminations of this sort prevail against Danville, Va. Shippers in western Wisconsin wishing to ship grain and live stock to Chicago are actually forced, to get the best rates, to ship west to St. Paul and then reship to Chicago, the return shipment passing through the town from which it started.

The Commission has called attention to the defect in the law which permits these unwarranted discriminations. It has recommended that it be given the power to determine what conditions are dissimilar and what discriminations are warranted.

The proposed bill ignores these recommendations and the necessity of their enactment into law. It does worse than that; it reenacts the bad provisions of the old law.

7. THE TRICK OF WITHHOLDING TESTIMONY.

It is a fact that railway companies have withheld important testimony upon the hearings before the Commission; that they have subsequently offered the testimony on the trial before the court, and have thereby succeeded in reversing and discrediting the Commission and in delaying the administration of justice; that this practice has been so prevalent as to call forth rebuke upon the railroad companies from the Supreme Court.

The Commission has reported these facts to Congress and recommended that legislation be enacted to correct this abuse.

This bill makes no provision to prevent the continuance of this wrongful practice on the part of the railway companies.

8. IMPRISONMENT FOR VIOLATIONS OF LAW.

The Commission advised against exempting railroad officers and agents from imprisonment for violating the law. The railroads advised Congress to amend the law and grant immunity from imprisonment. Congress adopted the recommendations of the railroads and passed the Elkins law, exempting railroad officers and agents from imprisonment for violations.

In its report the Commission calls attention to violations of the Elkins law, and states that such violations are "liable to increase unless effectively restrained."

This bill contains no provision restoring the penalty of imprisonment and offers no remedy to "effectively restrain" such violations.

9. THE KILLED AND INJURED EMPLOYEES AND PASSENGERS.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, the railroads killed and injured 10,617 passengers and 48,487 employees. The list of killed and injured of both passengers and employees has steadily increased from year to year. The record is an appalling one.

We annually kill relatively three times and injure twenty-five times as many railway employees, and kill relatively six and one-half times and injure twenty-nine times as many passengers as do the Prussian railroads.

Day after day we place those who are dearer to us than life in the safekeeping of the men who run the railroad trains of the country. Patient, courteous, watchful, brave—there are no stronger, finer types of character and courage in American life. Out on the "iron trail" these men grimly meet death, day and night, to save the trainload of humanity in their charge. The gruesome list of fatalities reveals the startling fact that more than one engineer out of every four dies upon his engine, his hand gripping throttle and lever.

For seven years the trainmen of America have maintained a representative here to plead for legislation, giving a little measure of justice to their families, when the dark hour comes, for which they ever wait with dread anxiety. For seven years their bills have died in the committee rooms of Congress.

The Interstate Commerce Commission has each year urged legislation to reduce the long and increasing roll of this awful slaughter of employees and passengers.

This bill makes no provision for the adoption of the block system, or other well approved safety appliances, or for any other progressive legislation, for the preservation of life.

OTHER CHANGES DEMANDED BY EXPERIENCE AND PUBLIC INTEREST—THE INIQUITY OF THE FREE PASS.

The interstate-commerce law prohibited discriminations and made the issue and use of railroad passes unlawful. The law was weak and inefficient. It was evaded for a time and then openly violated. This vicious and insidious form of influencing public sentiment and official action has been widely prevalent for years. A prominent and experienced railroad auditor has stated that 10 per cent of all railroad travel in this country is upon free transportation. Those who pay to ride must bear the burden of this free transportation, amounting to over $50,000,000 annually.

The free pass is furnished to public officers to influence official action. It may be accepted innocently, but, consciously or unconsciously, it colors judgment and ultimately and finally controls action.

No legislative body can act impartially upon any measure involving contention between the railroads and the public when such legislators accept and use free transportation furnished by the railway companies.

The late Collis P. Huntington spoke out of an abundant experience when he said of an official who was looking after legislation at the national capital that the gentleman had "many advantages with his railroads running out from Washington in almost every direction, on which he gives free passes to everyone whom he thinks can help him ever so little."

Mr. Paul Morton says: "Passes are given for many reasons, almost all of which are bad."

President Stickney, of the Chicago Great Western Railroad, said, in an address given in 1905 in this city, speaking of the provision of the interstate-commerce law against the use of free passes, that "Congressmen and Presidents, with rare exceptions, have ignored its provisions."

Whatever individual opinion may be entertained by Senators and Representatives upon this subject, the odium of violating laws which Congress has enacted ought in itself be sufficient to pass and enforce the most drastic legislation which can be framed, making it an offense punishable by imprisonment for anyone, be he public official or private citizen, to accept or use free transportation in any form.

EXPRESS COMPANIES NOT INCLUDED.

Every consideration that demands government regulation of the services and rates of railroad corporations demands the same regulation of the services and rates of express companies.

The bill should be amended as to clearly include express companies. The hearings before the Interstate Commerce Committee clearly established that there is just ground of complaint of these companies and need of effective regulations both as to services rendered and the rates charged.

"FAIRLY REMUNERATIVE."

The common carrier is entitled to make a just compensation. Just compensation is defined by the courts to be that compensation which will afford the carrier a fair return upon a fair value of its property. Again and again it has been held that a rate which does not afford just compensation is not a just and reasonable rate. The phrase "just and reasonable" has a clear and well defined meaning in the law. It measures what the public must pay. It measures all that the carrier is entitled to receive.

But the pending bill introduces a new qualifying term by which the carrier's rate is to be measured. The words "fairly remunerative" are added. What office are they to serve? For what purpose are they introduced? Are they to add something to the rate? If that is the purpose, they should be stricken from the bill. The carrier is entitled to nothing more than a just and reasonable rate. If the words "and fairly remunerative" are not designed to increase the rate, then they serve no purpose and should go out. These words introduce another element over which there will be controversy in the courts. The words will require judicial construction. For every reason they should be omitted.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I wish to say that those words were suggested to the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee by the Interstate Commerce Commission in the bill which they framed and forwarded to us. For myself I think I ought to say that they are after mature deliberation omitted from the bill which I had the honor to introduce.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am glad to learn that the Senator is not personally in favor of incorporating into the bill the added words.

Mr. President, perhaps I ought to say, with reference to the recommendation of the Interstate Commerce Commission at this session of Congress, as indicated and limited by the draft of a bill which was printed as coming from them, that I concede freely that it omits many of the recommendations which they have made year after year for a decade as being vital to the protection of the interstate commerce of this country.

I know that back of that change and other changes in their recommendations there is a world of significance. Since 1897 they have submitted their reports to Congress, always urging the same legislation as vitally necessary. They have appeared personally before the committees of Congress, arguing and pleading to have their recommendations enacted into law. If at last they have been driven to believe that they must take this bill or nothing, that they must take but a little fraction of that which is really essential to protect the people of this country against extortion and abuse, it does not annul, contradict, or overturn the recommendations which they have incorporated year after year for ten long years in their reports and urged in person upon the committees at every opportunity. I could say much more with respect to this matter. It is not necessary to do so at this time.

Attention is called to other changes that seem worthy of consideration when the bill is taken up in detail.

The bill, in extending the time for notice of changes in rates, provides that the carrier making such notice shall give "public notice." The word "public" would seem indefinite. Provision for notice to the Commission is not provided. In extending the time for notice of changes in rates in joint tariffs "public" is omitted and notice to the Commission is provided. It would seem that in both cases public notice and notice to the Commission should be required and the manner of public notice specified.

To empower the Commission to issue orders after full hearing and investigation upon its own motion, the words "upon complaint" should be omitted in the amendment to section 15. The scope of such orders should include all classifications and regulations affecting rates and services.

Likewise the Commission should be empowered, when any rate or classification has been found unreasonable or unjust, to substitute maximum, minimum, or absolute rates, or to substitute such other classification or regulation as shall be necessary to secure just rates and regulation in conformity with the requirements of the law.

In the amendment proposed to section 16 it provided that when "upon such hearing as the court may determine to be necessary, it appears that the order was regularly made and duly served," the court shall enforce obedience to such order. This provision may be construed as limiting the court to consideration of the regularity of making and serving the order, and to exclude consideration of the question whether the order is confiscatory. Any doubt with respect to this provision can be remedied by inserting after the word "served" the words "and not in violation of any of the constitutional rights of the carrier."

In addition to the specific enumerations in the bill, the report should show separately the receipts from and the operating expenses for interstate and State traffic. The report should show, in such detail as the Commission may direct, the amount and character of the freight and passenger traffic, and the hours of labor of all employees, and to what degree certain classes of employees are required to be on duty continuously for such length of time as may jeopardize the public safety.

Friday, April 20, 1906.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, when I concluded, late in the session yesterday, I was discussing certain features of this bill which seemed to me very defective, and I wish briefly at the outset this morning to review the propositions covered in what I said yesterday.

I had considered what I conceived to be unsound constitutional arguments. I had discussed what seemed to me to be unsound propositions which would limit the right of Government to base its control of transportation upon franchises issued by the sovereign power. I had discussed the broad court review and preliminary injunction. I had called attention to the history of the movement which culminated in the passage of the act of 1887. I presented for consideration the weakness and lack of vitality of that statute, and the urgent need of its amendment.

Following that, Mr. President, I traced briefly the development of industrial combination in this country and showed, as I believe logically, its relation to transportation. I think it was made plain that all of the industrial and commercial centralization of this country is closely related to the transportation problem. I submitted the recommendations and arguments of the Interstate Commerce Commission which it had presented to Congress session after session to secure legislation to control transportation charges and regulate service, to the end that industrial and commercial monopoly should no longer be fostered by especially favored transportation rates and regulations. I believe it was made clear that the country had suffered greatly because Congress had failed to respond to the recommendations made by the Interstate Commerce Commission with respect to the constantly increasing power of monopoly through railway concessions and privileges.

And then, Mr. President, coming down to what we are trying to do here to-day, I had begun to suggest the particular respects in which the pending bill fails to meet the recommendations of the Commission and the urgent needs of the commercial and industrial interests of the country.

I called attention to the fact that the Commission had recommended the valuation of railroad properties, and that this bill does not provide for it; that they had recommended the power to revise and fix rates and fares and charges upon their own motion, and that this bill does not provide for it; that they had recommended and had cited many cases showing the absolute necessity of conferring upon the Commission power to control the relation of rates, and that this bill does not provide for it; that they had made plain to the Congress and to the country the importance of giving the Commission authority over classification, and that this bill does not provide for it; that they had cited innumerable instances where it was important to the administration of justice with respect to the commerce of the country that they should have authority to fix minimum rates or an absolute rate, and that this bill does not provide for it; that they had pointed out the ability of the railroads of this country to nullify that section of the statute of 1887 with respect to the long and short haul clause, and that this bill does not in the least strengthen it.

Mr. President, in the course of this discussion the Commission has been much criticised because so many of its decisions have been reversed in the courts. The true reason for these reversals may be found in the annual reports of the Commission to Congress. Attention has again and again been directed to the fact that the railroad companies withheld testimony upon the trial of the case before the Commission and then introduced it when it came to a trial of the case before the court. Upon this new evidence the court often reversed the Commission. The railroads were thus enabled to embarrass the Commission and delay the administration of justice under this law. These reversals have often been cited on the floor of both Houses of Congress as showing the incompetence of the Commission. Yet the reports of the Commission to Congress have recommended that the law be so amended as to prevent this practice. This bill does not contain any such amendment.

Then, Mr. President, I called attention to the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission had questioned whether great injury would not result from so amending the law that no imprisonment should be imposed as a penalty for its violation; but that the railroad companies had for years pleaded before the committees here in Congress that imprisonment as a punishment for violation of the law might be abrogated. The Commission, in its reports and before the committees of Congress, gave admonition and warning that such amendment would in all human probability result in opening the doors wide for violation of the law. But Congress heeded the insistence of the railroad companies that imprisonment for violation of law should be abrogated, and the Elkins law was passed.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do, sir.

Mr. FORAKER. I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to be saying that the provision of law abrogating imprisonment for violation of the interstate-commerce act was contrary to the recommendation of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Am I correct?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I say this: After long years of pleading with the Committees on Interstate Commerce of both Houses, the Interstate Commerce Commission has been pushed from position to position with respect to its recommendations.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Wait a moment. I say that finally, after warning Congress that the abrogation of punishment by imprisonment would, in its judgment, be a dangerous thing, the Commission finally said if, in the opinion of Congress, it is deemed advisable—I am not quoting the exact words of the Commission, of course—we yield that point. I say that means this, and this only: The Commission has been pushed by the attitude of the committees of Congress from pillar to post, and that finally, in its extremis, it was ready to accept almost any legislation which it could get, provided it contained some provisions that would tighten up and make more stringent certain of the sections with respect to violations of the law.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield further to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator well said that he was not quoting the exact language of the Interstate Commerce Commission in what he has just now set forth. The fact is, as anyone can ascertain by reference to the official reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission, that repeatedly prior to the act of February, 1903, known as the "Elkins law," the Commission recommended that the law be so changed as to do away with imprisonment for offenses against it. In their seventeenth annual report, which was the first report after that law had been enacted, they dwell upon that and call attention to the fact that the change in the law was in accordance with their recommendation, made repeatedly on their own motion, without any desire on the part of anybody, so far as I am aware, that they should make it, and they speak of that provision of the law as one of its exceptionally good features.

Now, I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin while he is in the midst of his argument——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is all right.

Mr. FORAKER. But if he will allow me to do so, for I am sure he does not want to misrepresent the attitude of the Commission on that subject——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no.

Mr. FORAKER. I will ask that the Secretary read what the Commission said about the Elkins law in their report of December 15, 1903.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think I incorporate that a little bit later in what I have to say.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator objects to this——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And I do not care to have it injected into the speech at this point.

Mr. FORAKER. Well, I should not think the Senator would care to have incorporated in his speech what the Commission have set forth.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let me say to the Senator from Ohio that I am willing to have embraced in the RECORD here everything that bears pertinently upon this discussion. I shrink from nothing that hews to the line, sir.

Mr. FORAKER. Of course the Senator does not, but if the Senator does not desire to have the whole of this incorporated, will he object——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not know how much the Senator proposes to send up. He says if I object to the whole of it. If he proposes to send up the whole volume which he has in his hand, I do object to having it injected into the middle of my speech.

Mr. FORAKER. I am asking the Senator whether he has any objection to my reading from the official report of the Interstate Commerce Commission what they say upon that particular charge that he has been dwelling upon?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I call particular attention in what I have prepared to say here, to exactly what the Interstate Commerce Commission has recommended with respect to that proposition. Therefore I choose to have it come in regular order and in its proper relation to this whole subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin objects to the reading of the report.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not want to read all of the report. I would not trespass unduly on the Senator from Wisconsin; but he has made a very important statement, and if he will allow me to read a paragraph he will perhaps desire to change the statement he has made, if I correctly understood him.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I would not. I am familiar with everything the Senator would read. There is nothing on this subject in the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission with which I am not entirely familiar. Let me say that, and then I will proceed to address myself to this question.

Mr. FORAKER. I am glad to know somebody who is entirely familiar with everything that the Commission has said on this subject.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from Ohio will have ample opportunity, if he desires——

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; I will have.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. To challenge anything I may wish to say here. He will have ample opportunity to do it in his own time. I do not mean by that to cut off any reasonable interruption.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield further to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not just at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator frim Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow me to read one paragraph?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, yes.

Mr. FORAKER. That is all I want.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will consent to that.

Mr. FORAKER. I should think the Senator would not object to that.

Mr. President, the Commission, in the course of their discussion of the Elkins law, the whole of which, notwithstanding the Senator's familiarity with it, I commend to him for rereading, say this:

> The amended law has abolished the penalty of imprisonment, and the only punishment now provided is the imposition of fines. As the corporation can not be imprisoned or otherwise punished for misdemeanors than by money penalties, it was deemed expedient that no greater punishment be visited upon the offending officer or agent. The various arguments in favor of this change have been stated in former reports and need not here be repeated. Whether the good results claimed by its advocates will be realized is by no means certain, but the present plan should doubtless be continued until its utility is further tested.

And so they go on at considerable length, showing, as reference to their former reports shows, that they have been on their own motion repeatedly recommending that identical legislation before ever it was enacted by Congress.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I deny that the report read by the Senator or any of the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission recommend the abolition of imprisonment as a penalty for violation of the law. I assert that they have always maintained in their reports to Congress, notwithstanding the insistence of the railroad companies that it should be done, they doubted that it would be the means of bringing into court offenders against the law, which the railroad companies always professed to believe, in trying insidiously to get the committees of Congress to incorporate into the law the provision that punishment by imprisonment should be abrogated. The arguments referred to in previous reports are the arguments of the railroads, not the arguments of the Commission. I furthermore assert that in the last report made by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the report for 1905, they say that whatever they have said heretofore in commendation of the Elkins law they now desire to qualify. I am not quoting their language, but its import. Oh, I know, Mr. President, that it will be possible for the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER]—and he has already done so—as it will be possible for other Senators here to quote the Interstate Commerce Commission in approval of the Elkins law. I know it will be possible to quote Mr. Bacon, from my own State, and Mr. Cowan, of Texas.

Mr. President, I am impelled by the interruption to say that the records of Congress show that for nine years the Interstate Commerce Commission has cooled its heels around the corridors and about the doors of the committee rooms of Congress. Cowan, of Texas; Bacon, of Wisconsin; Call, of California—any number of men have been here pleading for legislation that would relieve the commerce of the country from the oppression under which it suffers.

And when finally this committee or the committees of Congress reported favorably the Elkins law, it occasioned a good deal of rejoicing among those men. It is possible to quote from Bacon and Call and Cowan and the Interstate Commerce Commission in commendation of the Elkins law. That is true; I concede that. The stir of life in the recesses of the committee room having charge of this legislation, of which the report of that measure gave evidence, was a great encouragement to these gentlemen, who had waited about here and had made their arguments, who had shown that the industries of this country were being oppressed, who had shown that the commerce of the country was languishing under the burdens imposed upon it by the railroads.

I say it was natural, Mr. President, that they should give some manifestations of joy that there had finally issued from the committees of Congress having charge of this subject of legislation evidences of life and interest. They had waited for nine or ten years, and they said many things at that time, the Commission said some things in their reports, which a careful reading of subsequent reports will show they are now seeking in a measure to qualify or retract. Take the very last report of the Commission, that for 1905, which is just laid on the desks of Senators. I do not quote its exact language, but it says, in substance, that many of the commendations heretofore given now have to be qualified. The Commission are coming to understand that the Elkins law did not do what they believed and hoped it would do; that it did not stop the payment of rebates; that it did not prevent the granting of privileges.

Mr. President, let me say that an investigation made while I had the honor to be governor of Wisconsin with respect to the effect of the Elkins law resulted in some important and startling disclosures.

In Wisconsin since 1854 the railroads, under a law which they succeeded in passing through the Wisconsin legislature, have paid taxes based upon their own report to the State of the amount of their gross earnings. You can see very readily that this law would give the railroad companies of that State the opportunity to determine for themselves the amount of their taxes. If they chose to report their gross earnings at a sum less than they actually were for the business of the State, they could correspondingly reduce their taxes.

Strongly suspecting that this was being done, by special message I urged the legislature of the State to authorize investigations into the books and accounts of the railroad companies doing business in Wisconsin to find out whether they were reporting the full amount of their earnings. That was during the session of the legislature of 1903. That was just about the time of the passage of the Elkins law, which was approved on the 19th of February, 1903.

The legislature passed the law providing for such an investigation, and under it there were installed by the State, in the principal offices of the railroad companies doing business in Wisconsin, experts to examine their books, and determine whether they were reporting their full earnings to the State of Wisconsin. Of course that took the cover off completely.

Now, Mr. President, it was disclosed by this investigation that the railroads had withheld, in reporting for taxation their gross earnings on Wisconsin business, over a period of six years, more than ten and one-half million dollars; and of this amount more than $7,000,000 were deductions for rebates paid in violation of the interstate-commerce act and the Elkins law. Of this amount, $6,180,000 was rebates on freight and $972,000 was rebates on passenger traffic.

This investigation was begun on October 1, 1903, and continued through that year and through the year 1904. The Elkins law went into effect on the 19th of February, 1903. The amount of rebates shown by this investigation to have been paid by one of the leading roads, on Wisconsin business alone, month by month through the year 1903, was, in round numbers, as follows:

January	$37,000
February	57,000
March	47,000
April	36,000
May	25,000
June	13,000
July	101,000
August	32,000
September	46,000
October	9,000
December	2,032

Mr. President, notwithstanding that the Elkins law went into effect February 19, more rebates were paid in February than in January, and more were paid in March than in January, and in July nearly three times as much was paid in rebates as in January; and the rebates only began to diminish, not in obedience to the Elkins law, but in recognition of the fact that there were experts from Wisconsin looking into their books. From the beginning of the investigation, October 1, the rebates were very perceptibly reduced.

Furthermore, Mr. President, the investigation showed that one of the leading roads paid more in rebates in 1903 than it had paid in 1902; while the other leading road doubled its rebates in 1903, paying that year $200,000 more rebates than in the year before the Elkins law was passed.

So I say, Mr. President, we have there in that one State indubitable evidence, admitting contradiction from no man, of the failure of the Elkins law as a restriction on the payment of rebates or the granting of privileges.

I agree with what I contend is at least the strong intimation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, that taking away all authority to administer punishment by imprisonment is manifestly one of the reasons why the railroad companies have violated the Elkins law with impunity.

So I say, Mr. President, that the Interstate Commerce Commission does well in modifying its former indorsement of the Elkins law. Study their reports carefully and you will see that they are getting away from the unqualified approval which they gave it the first two years after its enactment. The time will come when they will be obliged to confess that they were mistaken in everything they said in approval of it—very nearly, not entirely; there are good provisions in it; but so far as stopping rebates is concerned it has failed.

The demonstration made by the investigation of the railroads doing business in Wisconsin was that the rebates increased after the Elkins law was passed. The penalty of imprisonment had been taken away. That is what was the matter. That is what the railroads insisted upon before the committees of Congress, and that is what, if you will read with fairness the recommendations of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Commission had urged should not be done. But that is what the committees finally did, and as the result of it you have, as shown by the investigation of the railroad companies' books with respect to business done in Wisconsin, an increase of the payment of rebates under the Elkins law; and I have reason, as a result of that investigation, to assert my belief that the payment of rebates has increased under the Elkins law rather than diminished. I believe that ultimately an investigation of that subject will drive every man whose mind is open to honest conviction to that conclusion.

Mr. President, I started out at the opening of my remarks to recapitulate what I had said yesterday in order to get back to a point of beginning for to-day. So I must not give way to the call which every one of these questions and issues makes upon me to digress into the field of discussion of this great question which in every phase is as broad as the country, and which goes deeply and vitally into the interests and lives of all the people.

Mr. President, I find here upon my desk one of the passages in the last report of the Commission, issued December 14, 1905, for which I sought a few moments ago in my notes. It reads as follows:

> In our annual report for 1903 we endeavored to explain the changes in the regulating statute effected by the Elkins law, so called, which was approved in the previous February, and made some favorable comments upon its operation. A similar opinion was expressed in the report made a year ago. Further experience, however, compels us to modify in some degree the hopeful expectations then entertained. Not only have various devices for evading the law been brought into use, but the actual payment of rebates as such has been here and there resumed.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do, sir.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator read the whole of that paragraph?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, I do not know how extended it is——

Mr. FORAKER. The next two or three sentences.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It may go clear through the report.

Mr. FORAKER. No; there are only two or three other sentences. If the Senator will allow me, I will read them.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will read them.

Mr. FORAKER. I have them before me.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will say to the Senator from Ohio I will read them.

> Instances of this kind have been established by convincing proof, on which prosecutions have been commenced and are now pending. More frequently the unjust preference is brought about by methods which may escape the penalties of the law, but which plainly operate to defeat its purpose. This does not imply any want of satisfaction with the act of 1903, which we regard as a most admirable measure, nor any belief that there is a general return to former practices, for the fact is undoubtedly otherwise; but it does mean that this type of evil has by no means disappeared and that it is liable to increase unless effectively restrained.

Let me say to the distinguished Senator from Ohio that when the Interstate Commerce Commission have had the opportunity to investigate the books of the railroad companies as freely and thoroughly as we have in Wisconsin with respect to Wisconsin business they will not put any reservations upon their language as they did there.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. They will easily be driven to the position that the violations of law under the Elkins Act with respect to discriminations have not been checked or stopped at all. Indeed, Mr. President, as shown by the patient and careful investigation made by the experts of Wisconsin they increased under the Elkins law. And let me say this——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question before he gets away from that subject?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, certainly. But I will not get away from it; I like it.

Mr. FORAKER. Would the Senator expect evil practices to cease without an enforcement of the law? The law by itself being simply put on the statute books could not, of course, break up anything.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, Mr. President; I would expect the eminent gentlemen who are running the railroads of this country to obey a law passed by Congress which makes an act of theirs criminal before they have been called to the bar of the court to answer in a criminal proceeding.

I remember a few days ago in the discussion here that the Senator from Ohio rose in his place and said to some one—I do not remember who it was—that the railroad officials of this country are not criminals. I say to the Senator that the records, so far as they have been exposed, show that the railroad officials of this country are, with rare exceptions, criminals under the statute.

Now, I mean what I say. I see Senators on that side smile; but let me say to you, gentlemen, that when in Wisconsin we summoned the railroad companies into court to answer for having juggled the reports of their annual gross earnings, which they were required by law to make under oath to the State official, when they appeared before the court and the testimony of the State was but partly offered, when the arguments over certain law propositions had been concluded, those officials—and they are just as honorable as the officials of any railroad companies in the United States—came into court and stipulated that they had violated the law, and went to the supreme court on a question of the statute, as to whether or not, to state it specifically, their report to the State officer and its acceptance by that officer, even if the report was a violation of the statute, had not bound the State. That is what they did. They confessed a violation of the statute; they confessed having under oath reported their gross earnings short of the true amount as required by the statute; and they are just as honorable as the railroad officials of any State in this Union.

Mr. President, before I concluded yesterday I called the attention of the Senate to the list of killed and injured in this country—railway employees and passengers—and I presented the facts to show that such accidents are many times more numerous here than in Prussia, where the railroads are operated in the interest of the public welfare; and I ask, on that ground, consideration for an amendment which I shall offer before this bill is disposed of to prevent this needless destruction of life and limb.

I also called attention, Mr. President, to certain other defects where amendments, it seems to me, are required in the pending bill, if it is to be within constitutional limitation and if it is to be made effective for the protection of the commerce of this country.

I do not reflect upon any of the gentlemen who have prepared this bill, but I desire to ask members of the Senate who would see a measure framed that shall in all its provisions be guarded with respect to constitutional violations to scan every line and section of it.

And now I come, sir, to a more extended discussion of certain powers which should be conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission.

BROAD POWERS DEMANDED.

Reason and experience alike compel the conclusion that any supervision or regulation of railway rates or services, to be of material benefit to the public and adequate protection from railway abuses, must be the fullest and most complete regulation. It must not stop with conferring authority to prevent only a part of the evils of which there is complaint. It must meet and satisfy all just complaints. It must anticipate those devices of the future which would seek to circumvent and defeat its purpose. Unless it does these things, it will be found in the hour of need that it is too weak to prevent even those abuses against which it is directed.

To attain these ends, broad powers must be conferred upon the Commission. It must be assumed that the Commission in its exercise of these powers will not exceed that which is wise and necessary in the public interest. The Commission is accountable in the event of any such excess or abuse of power to the courts and to the public.

To accomplish these results the system of regulation must be right in principle; it must rest on the broad foundation that the Government shall possess powers of correction coextensive with the railway corporation's powers of abuse. Whenever the railroad makes, in respect to its service, any rates, classification, or regulation whatsoever which are unjust or unreasonable as compared with any other rate or regulation or which are of themselves unreasonable or excessive, or does any other thing or pursues any policy at variance with the public interest and the general welfare, then the Government should have and exercise the power to set aside and prohibit such injustice or abuse and institute and enforce in lieu thereof any other rate, classification, regulation, thing, or policy that will best subserve the general welfare.

Whatever powers are conferred, their exercise should not in any manner be made solely to depend upon the complaints of any individual or class of citizens. In the benefits of this legislation all are entitled to share. The welfare of all the people as consumers should be the supreme consideration of the Government. It should be the chief concern of the Commission.

I am driven to protest against the attitude in which the proposed bill approaches the subject of railway regulation. The bill has been heralded to Congress and to the public as a measure to increase the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission and to confer upon the Commission the authority and the power to enforce the provisions of the interstate-commerce act that all rates shall be just and reasonable. In fact, the bill, if passed in its present form, will not so increase the powers of the Commission. The provisions which should be in this bill to that end are made conspicuous by reason of their omission.

Even this bill, with its powers limited to a provision for publicity and for equalizing relatively unfair rates on complaint only, meets with formidable opposition in this Senate. Senators have contended in debate, day after day, that even these powers should not become effective without providing that every order of the Commission should in every item and particular be completely retried and reheard, de novo, in the courts.

If we view this attitude with the utmost consideration and respect for its exponents, the best we can say of it is that it expresses profound distrust of any system of Government regulation of railroads. The logical conclusion of such a position is that it is unsafe to confer upon the Commission the powers that are vital and essential to any system of regulation in the public interest that will reach and correct unreasonable and unjust rates. The distrust that results in the omission of vital and essential powers from the bill differs only in degree from the distrust that would prevent any powers conferred from becoming effective.

The effort that seeks to prevent the real exercise of any additional power has at least the merit of consistency with the attitude of distrust, to which it is a response. If the Commission can not safely be intrusted with the power to regulate rates with respect to their reasonableness, it can not safely be intrusted with the power to determine the relation of rates of which it may receive complaints. If we apprehend that the Commission will not exercise a given power wisely and in good faith, that power should not be conferred, whether it be great or little. Any legislation which does not proceed upon the basis that it is a wise, just, and safe exercise of legislative power can not achieve any enduring good. Without these supporting considerations, such legislation can be urged only on grounds of political expediency. But let no man be misled by the expectation that any half-way measure will serve even the end of political expediency. The public will not accept from its servants any compromise of the full discharge of their official obligation. It experienced one great disappointment in railway legislation, which failed to enact that which was demanded by the conditions and that which it was supposed to enact. It will not require another ten years to discover the deficiencies in this legislation. They will be recognized at once.

THE RELATION OF RATES.

That powers to regulate the relation of rates and to determine rates for the future, if conferred, would not be exercised by the Commission wisely and in good faith, is suggested on every hand. The magnitude of such power is urged against intrusting it to the Commission. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] indorses the decision of the court in the Maximum Rate case, not only as a correct interpretation of the language of the statute, but also because that decision, in his opinion, stopped the Commission from the further exercise of the great and dangerous powers—

> To bring into judgment a score of railways, serving different sections of the country, and a hundred cities seeking access to the same market, and to balance their claims and pass sentence upon their commercial opportunities.

No one can dispute with the Senator the magnitude of this far-reaching power. But is this power of any less magnitude or capable of any more dangerous application when exercised by railroads than if exercised by the Commission? He says further:

> We are not, therefore, attempting to restore the power which the Commission lost by that decision. No careful student of this problem would do that if he could, and no Congress, in my opinion, will ever enact a law to take the development of widely separated regions, the interests of competing markets, the growth of rival seaports contending for the prizes of the ocean, out of the hands of the railways, which have grown up with them, and the natural laws of business which have created them, and stake their worldly prospects on the decision of any earthly tribunal, even if its salary were raised to correspond with the size of such a job.

Just what distinction can be made between the exercise of this power by the railroads and its exercise by a Government commission? It is clear that such a commission would be an "earthly tribunal." Are we to conclude that there is something more than earthly about railroad managers; that they, perhaps, exercise these enormous powers by some divine right and interpret the "laws of business" under the guidance of divine inspiration?

I submit that we can not progress in this legislation on any other basis than on the assumption that the powers proposed to be conferred will be exercised honestly and in good faith. At the worst those intrusted with the exercise of these powers will be agents of the Government and accountable to the Government, to the public, and to the courts for any misuse of their power. A private railway management is accountable to no one. All the outrages chargeable against any form of management or possible to commit in the conduct of the transportation business of the country have been repeatedly and constantly perpetrated by our free and unregulated railway managements without accountability and with scarcely even so much as any attempt at concealment. The experience of the American public in its efforts to secure fair treatment at the hands of the railroads has been a record of the most bitter disappointment. It is inconceivable that on this record there should be an appeal to the people against Government regulation on the ground that such regulation might be administered in subservience to selfish ends and not in the interest of the general welfare.

There is nothing in the record of railway domination of the industrial development of this country which should deter us from taking that domination "out of the hands of the railways." On the contrary there is much to demand such action. The mainspring of the railway policy that decides which centers shall succeed and which shall fail, is the selfish interest of the carrier. It has no concern in the promotion of commerce in the public interest. The social economy of serving a given territory from the center which would serve it best and cheapest, the economy of the multiplication of convenient centers of trade and industry, of the building up of many small cities well distributed over the country, is wholly disregarded. It does not suit the schemes of the traffic managers. Their aim is the long haul, the big tonnage, the large revenues, and the dividend. To these considerations all else is sacrificed.

In the interest of this policy the bulk of the country's commerce is centralized for distribution at four points across the continent, the Atlantic coast, the head of the Great Lakes, the Missouri River, and the Pacific coast. The railroads are fighting every interior center between the Atlantic coast and the head of the Great Lakes; every center between the Great Lakes and the Missouri River; every center between the Missouri River and the Pacific coast. Only where water competition enters to restrain the rapacity of carriers is there peace or feeling of security. From the Southeast to the Northwest the complaints come; and from the Northeast to the Southwest. In every locality it is the most important industries and lines of trade that are attacked and are suffering.

A few of these oppressed interior localities have laid their grievances before the committees of Congress. They are merely types of scores of communities similarly situated. These, however, are important of themselves, and of vast significance. For the most part they are cities of considerable size, and represent large sections of country. These cities are distributed from the Atlantic coast to the Pacific. There is Danville, in Virginia; Atlanta, in Georgia; Nashville, in Tennessee; St. Louis, in the Mississippi Valley; Denver, on the Great Plains; and Spokane, in the Far West. They simply represent types.

The smaller places do not complain so much—not because they do not suffer; they suffer most, as a matter of fact—but because they are without commercial organization and without recourse in their industrial plight.

The complaints of shippers and representative citizens before the committees of Congress showed in detail the nature of the discriminations between localities. It covers discriminations in all the various forms between persons and commodities. It shows the enormous advances in freight rates. It sets forth the abandonment by the railways of an enormous traffic to irresponsible private corporations, freight line, refrigerator car, and express companies, and the discrimination and oppression practiced by those corporations.

I have prepared a brief review of this evidence in a condensed and related form, which I shall append to my remarks, and, if it is necessary in order to obtain that privilege, I suspend now and ask it. I have condensed the testimony taken before the committees, and I portray in some seventy-four typewritten pages the iniquities under which the commerce of the country suffers because it has been given over to the domination of the corporations. It is an array of fact that refutes utterly the claim made in this debate that the railways should be permitted to control rates, regulations, and the destination of our commerce. I ask leave, sir, to print that as an appendix to my remarks. (Appendix A.)

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, leave is granted.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It will be convenient as a reference for those who are interested in these facts and conditions.

Mr. President, I think perhaps I ought to say that it is my personal belief that not only the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], but many other Senators, when they come, as they will come, because of their interest in this important subject, to consider every phase of it, as bearing on the welfare of the people of this country, will be found standing for that which the interests of this country demand.

I recall, in the course of the eloquent and able address delivered early in the debate by the Senator from Iowa, the statement, which may have escaped others, but which I noted, that his opinions with respect to this question, though perhaps it was more particularly with respect to the Commission itself, had undergone somewhat of a change in the last year or so. I am sure that he approaches this question to-day with an open mind.

When any man who cares for his country comes to realize the true significance of the control of commerce upon the development of all industry, the location of markets, the building of cities, the density of population, the tremendous influence upon the economic and social life of the people, with all its consequence to this generation and the generations to come, he will be shocked that it should all be left in the hands of the traffic managers of railroads. The control of commerce—its regulation, its rates, its distribution and destination—go to the upbuilding of the State, the nation. It must be controlled unselfishly, controlled with the highest patriotism, upon a broad, national policy.

When this idea is once grasped, when it once possesses the American people, does the Senate believe, does anyone believe that they will permit the destiny of this nation to be controlled by a board of managers of consolidated railways?

Sir, I say to the Senate here to-day that nothing, absolutely nothing, can prevent the ultimate government ownership of the railroads of this country except a strict government control of the railroads of the country. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin will suspend while the Chair warns the occupants of the galleries against further violation of the rules of the Senate, which forbid applause or demonstrations in the galleries. The Senator from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I next invite attention to the arguments and misstatements which have been made in this debate with respect to the regulation of railroads abroad.

FOREIGN RESULTS MISSTATED.

For the purpose of limiting the scope of legislation and the powers to be conferred upon the Commission, faults and failures in government regulation abroad have been alleged in the course of this debate. The argument is scarcely a legitimate one, unless all of the conditions are known and presented, so that just comparison may be instituted. However, since it has been made so prominent a feature of the discussion by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], it demands consideration. I regret, Mr. President, that I am not honored with the presence of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Much the same arguments to the same effect were used with reference to several foreign countries. All were offered as examples of the dire effects of government regulation which is strong enough to regulate. It will be entirely fair, therefore, to test his conclusion by examination of any one of the typical countries cited by him to sustain his contention.

As an example, the Prussian system may well be considered. In Prussia governmental regulation of railways has gone to the extreme of government ownership and operation. It is contended by those opposed to effective government regulation that all the evils resulting from government interference are found intensified in the German system. Another reason why these representations of the Prussian system may very properly be made the test of all the foreign comparisons introduced into this discussion is the availability in the case of Prussia of abundant reliable information showing the actual conditions existing.

The chief criticisms preferred against the Prussian, as well as other foreign systems, are: First, that the administration of the railways and the making of rates are perverted to serve the political ends of the officials having charge; second, that the rates are adjusted on an inflexible, arbitrary basis, which is prohibitive for important commodities and long distances; third, that the system does not subserve the general interest and the needs of commerce.

The assertion that under the Prussian system the rate-making powers of the Government are exercised in subservience to political ends and not honestly in the public interest may be dismissed with the briefest consideration. It is probably sufficient to say that no satisfactory evidence warranting such a conclusion has been thus far offered. It is manifestly improper for us, strangers to all the facts and conditions, to here pass judgment condemning the acts and motives of public officials highly esteemed in their own country.

I stop a moment, Mr. President, to read a few lines from a contribution made to the Journal of Political Economics in February, 1906, by B. H. Meyer. B. H. Meyer was a professor in the Wisconsin University. He was at the head of the transportation department of the department of economics of that university. He had been offered, Mr. President, I may say, at a very much higher salary, a like position in two different leading universities of the East. He declined these offers because of his devotion to the State in which he was born. He had been offered the editorship of one of the leading railway publications of the country at a salary amounting to three times that which he received from the University of Wisconsin. He declined it. He consented to accept, at my hands, an appointment upon the railway commission of Wisconsin, established under the law of 1905, because he saw an opportunity to serve in a public way the State which had given him birth, which had educated him, and which had helped to make him one of the foremost authorities upon the transportation problem in the world to-day.

And let me say, Mr. President, that Professor Meyer returned to take his position upon the Wisconsin railway commission from a trip abroad, in which he made a study of this great question in foreign countries.

With respect to the political phase of railroad regulation in Prussia, I wish to read from Professor Meyer the following. Speaking of the conflict of politics in railway regulation in this country as compared and contrasted with the conflict of politics in Prussian regulation under government ownership, he says:

> In the invidious American sense of the word, the Prussian railways are most emphatically not in politics. There are no paid lobbyists, no subsidized newspapers, no partisan publication bureaus, no "rake offs." I have been able to discover only one instance of dishonesty and faithlessness, and that was a case of a subordinate employee who had appropriated railway scrap to his own uses. The case was tried only a few months ago. The man was sentenced to the penitentiary for a term of five years.
> Who will venture to say what would happen if the books of the American railway companies were to be subjected to the tests of the Prussian, with the same consequences in the courts? In all the testimony taken before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce I do not remember having seen a single statement something like this:
> Question. "Mr. ———, does your road discriminate?"
> Answer. "No, sir."
> Question. "Mr. ———, do you pay rebates?"
> Answer. "No. And I wish to say to you, Senators, that if you desire to convince yourselves of the truth of my statements, I cordially invite you to appoint expert accountants to investigate the books of my company."

There is quite a difference apparently, Mr. President, between the conditions existing with respect to political bias in Prussia and in this country.

The statement that the basis of railway rates established under government administration in Prussia is arbitrary and inflexible and not adjusted to meet the legitimate requirements of commerce is not borne out by an examination of the facts. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], in describing the Prussian rate system, dismisses some sixty special and commodity tariffs with little more than the passing statement that "government rate making in Prussia has resulted in giving discriminations to this traffic." If by discrimination we mean the unequal treatment of different commodities and places, basing this inequality upon a careful study and analysis of the concrete economic conditions under which the traffic is conducted, it is true that more than 80 per cent of the Prussian traffic is carried at discriminating rates. But this is not the sense in which "discrimination" is used in describing American abuses in railway management. If the German use of "discrimination" is made the test, every rate and every classification which departs from a yardstick rule of making classification and rates is a discrimination.

It is interesting to note in passing that the opponents of government regulation of rates have based many of their arguments on the contention that under such regulation these discriminations would be impossible.

The following is a summary of the special and commodity tariffs in force on the Prussian state railways and the per cent of the total traffic which in 1902 moved under the tariffs in each class, respectively:

	Per cent.
Special tariffs 1, 2, and 3	24.3
Commodity tariffs, 5 to 10 tons	.5
Commodity tariffs, 10 tons and over	64.2

The remainder of the traffic is handled under the general-class tariffs.

The development of the commodity tariffs is shown by the fact that the traffic moved under them increased from 45.5 per cent in 1890–91 to 64.2 per cent in 1902.

This goes to show that the system is not inflexible, but that it develops with the needs of the country's commerce.

Among the important commodity tariffs is the raw-materials tariff, which embraces, among other things, timber, stone, potash, bituminous coal, coke, briquettes.

You see how the Government in Prussia considers everything pertaining to the development of particular sections of the country that have it within them industrially to build up specific industries. While the rates under those commodity tariffs vary with the distance, as they undeniably should, the rate is not simply a mileage rate. The scale varies for different commodities; for the same commodities for different distances and in different sections and in different directions. Among the many commodity tariffs made up in like manner are the following: Wood, iron pyrites, zinc ore, chicory root, potash, stone, salt, artificial manures (4 tariffs), road-building materials, stones (10 tariffs), coal, coke, briquettes, and coal ashes (5 tariffs), iron ore and iron-ore slags—which are used for agricultural manures—(3 tariffs), slate, alcohol (6 tariffs), grain and mill products (2 tariffs), slate, alcohol, kerosene, petroleum, and naphtha. There are also distinct scales for export shipments of grain, potatoes, starch, fabrics, iron and steel articles, glass goods, iron, vitriol, etc., as well as import tariffs on cotton and similar raw materials. Besides those special tariffs as above, there are special scales in the tariffs for commerce into the German Levant and East Africa.

Under the policy of the Prussian railway ministry in respect to tariffs on raw materials and other commodities of importance in industrial development and general welfare of the country, this traffic has been developed with signal success. The following figures, taken from the official publications, show the enormous increase in the railway traffic in a number of such commodities from 1885 to 1903:

	Per cent.
Iron ore	189
Bituminous coal, coke	117
Iron articles	241
Mine timber, lintels	145
Lignite	184
Cut timber	126
Rough stone, brick	247
Paper and pulp board	289
Burnt lime	224
Artificial manures	405
Mill and milling fabrics	190
Refined sugar	173
Cement	418
Potatoes	194
Beets (sugar)	168
Pottery	137
Pig iron	178
Glass, glassware	193
Cellulose and celluloid	224

These figures show how they have built up great industries and developed special lines of traffic under strict government regulation in Prussia.

It is to the further credit of the Prussian management that those increases in traffic were brought about with constantly decreasing charges and constantly increasing revenues to the state, and without any of that harrowing economic labor such as has been represented by some investigators of this subject.

It becomes of interest to consider the manner in which such adjustments and reductions are brought about under the Prussian system. Bear in mind, in the meantime, the familiar forces and inducements which, in this country, secure from the railways special concessions, commodity rates, and rebates, in the interests of big and influential shippers, and tariff concessions to favored localities.

It has been stated by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] of the Prussian commodity rates that—

> These reductions can not be governed by economic reasons, but are in the main brought about by the pressure of political and industrial interests, and there must be, and indeed there is, a constant struggle between these interests to secure for each its share of the favors of low rates.

When it is asserted that "these reductions can not be governed by economic reasons," I beg to ask upon what other reasons do they rest? The proceedings of the various bodies which have to do with the making of such rates show that it is exactly the economic reasons which govern these changes. Other reasons may occasionally enter, but if there is one factor which above all others determines these reductions, it is the economic factor. Various economic forces struggle for control there as they do here. In the United States this struggle is frequently a one-sided one. When parties are unequal in strength, the railroad invariably decides in favor of the stronger party, irrespective of the justice in the controversy. In Germany, the Government, on the basis of wise and carefully formulated legislation, decides the rules under which this struggle shall take place.

Practically all reductions represented in the Prussian special and commodity tariffs are the result of a well-established, systematic procedure, in which all interests are fairly and fully and publicly heard. This system, after being tried in Prussia, has come to be adopted in most continental states.

Mr. President, I stop a moment to ask the attention of the Senate again to what Professor Meyer, to whom I am under special obligations with respect to this phase of the discussion, says, as a result of his investigation. The character of the investigations of complaints, the openness and publicity on all contested matters before government officials in Prussia, is in striking contrast to the methods employed by the railway officials controlling transportation in America. Professor Meyer states that there are conflicts there between different industrial centers and interests as there are here. He says:

> Such a conflict of interests exists in Prussia. It exists also in the United States. In Prussia all these conflicts take place in the full light of publicity. The proceedings of councils and committees and the legislature reveal every phase of every railway rate question which is brought forward.
> In Prussia every interest, no matter how small, has an opportunity of being heard publicly on every railway question which affects it, and the decision is made public and known to all. In the United States only the strong and importunate ones are sure of consideration. There are no public deliberations. There is no public decision. Little or nothing may become known to those who would profit by such knowledge.

The Prussian state railways are divided for administrative purposes into 21 groups or managements. In the territory of each of these managements there are public, semiofficial boards, in which the chambers of commerce, the chiefs of the various mercantile corporations and unions of manufacturers or producers, and the unions or lodges of agricultural, forest, and other extractive industries have their representatives. These boards, constituted as indicated, cooperate with the local railway managements in each district in determining the needs of commerce. They meet at stated periods, and on motion of the persons in interest may be called together at any time as need arises. Their deliberations pass ultimately to the central railway council for the state. In this way changes and adjustments are brought about in a public manner, all interests being heard fully, and reforms are worked out in such a manner as not to injure the general interest of the state and to give each interest represented in the various districts its proper weight and the rates and classifications called for by its economic needs. One of the results of this deliberate method of arriving at and determining changes in rates and regulations is that the rates so established are never afterwards raised, and stability, which is so important a factor in business relations, is thereby secured.

As going to show the high esteem in which the German method of rate adjustment is held by impartial and well-informed authorities, I quote the following from the London Statist:

> The German Government, true to its tendency, is never weary of accelerating their progress by assisting trade in every way possible. In Prussia, for example, the railways are all state property, and they are worked, not to bring in the most revenue possible but to promote trade to the utmost.
> Moreover, traders are encouranged and assisted in forming all kinds of societies calculated to promote their interests, and the Government continually consults representatives of the different trades. Over and above this, the Government is always ready to use its great influence, not only to open up new markets but likewise to acquire markets for its traders.

Recently there have been two authoritative studies of our railway system by representatives of the German Government. In reporting one of these, Mr. G. Franke (Archiv für Eisenbahnwesen) makes a most instructive comparison of American and German methods of rate adjustment from the German standpoint.

Mr. Franke is a Prussian governmental official of long experience, having had charge in the technical affairs of railway administration.

I shall quote a few paragraphs from Mr. Franke's report, because, as I remember it, the Senator from Massachusetts particularly arraigned the Prussian system as having demonstrated that a large government control is a most harmful thing for the industrial development of the country. Mr. Franke came to this country and made a study of our institutions, of our commercial and industrial development, of our railroad systems, and he contrasted them with those of Prussia. He says, in part:

We Germans nowadays especially arrange all our tariffs and make changes in them exclusively to further general economic needs of all the people by reductions. In a very subsidiary degree we give effect to considerations of revenue.

Of course where you leave it to the railroads the first consideration is revenue—dividends, surplus.

* * * Per contra, in American considerations of getting the utmost for the railways is the fundamental basis of rate making. * * * Rates are never made to serve the general interest of all the people. They obtain consideration only indirectly or covertly in so far as it answers the purpose of filling the strong box of the railways, as, for example, in cases where a railway makes a rate to hold tonnage or to help some city or a certain market or is forced to meet competition of certain products in the world's markets.

In respect to the interests of shippers he says:

This one-sided view of regarding the railways as private enterprises can not permit the shippers to have as a right a voice in the determination of rates as is the case in Germany. In the case of mammoth industries this is provided for by the community of interest of the great financiers. Except for this identity of control there is no regard paid to the interests of the shippers at large. In consequence thereof there is continually a bitter conflict of interests going on between the tariff policy of the railways and the needs of commerce, industry, and agriculture. The general impression received from interviews with shippers, a study of the pleadings and decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and reading the testimony and reports of the Congressional committees lead one to the conclusion that the great industrial combinations are of course well satisfied with the railway rate, but that the great mass of shippers whose livelihood is dependent on the proper adjustment of a railway rate are utterly dissatisfied and often greatly embittered at their position. From this conclusion it will be seen that it is unfair, as is sometimes done in Germany, to take a few rates for iron ore, coal, or some other crude materials of the great industrial combinations and place in contrast thereto our rates and to draw conclusions from these paper rates, quite apart from the fact that a great number of them have no real significance because of the union of the railway and industrial interests in a common purse.

As, for instance, the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company in coal as reported in an important decision handed down by the Supreme Court only a few days ago.

The greed for profits and the disregard of public interest which characterize American railway management is well reflected in the lack of proper provision for the safety of passengers and employees. The chief cause of this condition of affairs is the greed of American railways for profits, which keeps them from employing enough men to properly discharge their duties and the utter insufficiency, as compared with the German standard, of the number of persons employed to guard against accidents.

This is indeed a serious arraignment of our let-alone policy in contrast with absolute government control. I follow it up with some very important and significant facts.

The latest German report on our railways, just published a few weeks ago by Hoff & Schwabach—the Librarian of Congress was kind enough at my request to cable for some copies of the work, which arrived several days ago and may be consulted by those interested in pursuing this investigation.

In this report by Hoff & Schwabach, it is computed that if the American railways were as carefully guarded as the German we would have employed for that purpose 636,000 men, whereas we actually have less than 50,000, or less than 8 per cent of that number. It is further pointed out that our railways employ relatively fewer men in the maintenance of way and structures. These conditions, taken in connection with the lack of safety devices and our exposed and unguarded grade crossings, result in many unnecessary accidents. It is computed in this report that, relatively, the railways of the United States kill six and one-half times as many and injure twenty-nine times as many passengers as the Prussian railways, while the proportionate number of employees killed is more than three times, and the injured twenty-five times as great on the railways in the United States as in Prussia.

Both of these German reports point out that all rate comparisons between the two countries on the ton-mile basis are entirely misleading. The Hoff & Schwabach report says in this connection:

The conditions in America are fundamentally different from ours and make unrestricted comparisons regarding the level of rates impossible.

When due allowances are made for differences arising from capitalization, mail and express service, companies' freight, etc., it is the conclusion of the authors that the Prussian passenger rates are less than one-half of the rates on our roads, and the freight rates are also considerably lower.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] directed the attention of the Senate and the country to that fact on the very day the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] concluded his address. The Senator from South Carolina, who is in charge of this bill, and who is alert in the public interest, rose promptly and presented a newspaper dispatch which referred to the contents of this volume, and noted the fact that when the necessary corrections are made to secure a legitimate basis for comparison of rates between America and Prussia they enjoy the lower rates and fares.

Professor Meyer, of the Wisconsin railway commission, to whom I have before alluded, who has made a very careful study of transportation matters here and abroad and is an authority on this subject, says of these comparisons that "no such careful comparisons have ever before been made."

The report expresses astonishment at some of the peculiar and mistaken views current here regarding German railways. One of these mentioned was the idea expressed to them by an American railway official that German railways are controlled in matters of policy and rates by political considerations.

This American railway official seems to entertain the same views respecting this subject as the Senator from Massachusetts.

After diligent and unprejudiced study of American conditions these German investigators say:

The descriptions in the preceding chapters will bear testimony to the fact that we earnestly endeavored to acquaint ourselves with the conditions of the railways in the United States without prejudice. With full recognition of the arrangements and services of the railways in the United States, their great work in the development of the country, we found nothing surprisingly grand or overwhelming; there may be found there as everywhere in the cultured world for the observing well-informed traveler, that which is better and that which is less good than what we have.

In Mr. Franke's article is made a detailed study of the many factors and conditions which invalidate comparisons of rates on the ton-mile basis as a criterion of the relative reasonableness of transportation charges in the two countries. Insomuch as it has been sought by such comparison to make it appear that our rates are reasonable it may be well to enumerate briefly some of these differences as given by Mr. Franke. He says:

It is well to state at the outset that it is impossible to arrive at reliable average freight rates for German and American railways. This is due to the difference of the fundamental basis on which the rates are established. All the more so as in the United States, the rates vary extraordinarily for the various species of freights, depending on the kind of traffic, whether local or through traffic, and still more dependent on the character of the railway. For this reason typical freights reduced to units of haul can not be established for separate classes of freight.

Among the reasons given by Mr. Franke why the "statistical average income per ton per mile is not adapted for bases of comparison" are the following:

(a) The average ton-mile rate on American railways is unduly depressed by the large proportion of transportation wasted by circuitous routing. The final report of the Industrial Commission gives examples of such circuitous routing by which 60 per cent—formerly as high as 250 per cent—of the transportation necessary is wasted.

(b) In the traffic statistics of the United States, companies' freight is included. This increases the tonnage without correspondingly increasing the revenues. This is not done in the German reports.

(c) The German statistics embrace large revenues from a comparatively small tonnage of high rate freight which is handled by the railroads there, but in this country is handled by express, fast freight, and private car lines companies, and the earnings of which is not included in the reported railroad revenues.

(d) The average length of haul for freight traffic in Germany on all Government roads regarded as a system is 78 miles (125 kilometers). In the United States, on all railways regarded as a system, the length of haul is about three times as great or (1901) 252 miles. It is a well-understood principle that the average rate per mile decreases with the length of the haul.

(e) The statistical average on American roads does not represent the average of what the people have to pay, but a "lower rate than the public ever get." It is the average of the high rates charged the general public and the special rates to favored shippers after the rebates are deducted. The German average represents the rates that all the people pay.

In addition to the foregoing enumerated factors there are many other considerations that invalidate comparisons of rates per ton per mile and which are not taken into account in the railroad arguments. Foremost of which is the fundamental difference in the character of the traffic handled by railways here and in Europe. The proportion of ton-miles of cheap, bulky, heavy traffic, such commodities as soft coal and iron ore, carried by our roads is much greater, relatively, than abroad. While the quantity of this class of traffic has been greatly increased on the Prussian railways owing to the policy of low rates to the points having no water transportation, the proportion of such traffic is very much less than in this country, where coal alone constitutes about one-third of the total tonnage. In the countries of Continental Europe, where for centuries have been maintained extensive systems of river improvements and canals, the bulk of such traffic is carried by water because that is the cheapest known transportation. The omission of this great volume of the low-grade traffic from railroad tonnage of Germany obviously invalidates the average gross revenue per ton per mile as a basis of comparison of rates of the two countries.

The Senator from Massachusetts makes repeated reference to the fact that a large volume of the freight traffic of continental countries is carried by waterways. He refers to this fact as evidence of the failure in Government management or control of the railways. He says the commerce of these countries is driven to the waterways. The fact is that the waterways carried the freight traffic of these countries for centuries before the advent of railways. It would be just as pertinent to suggest that the inefficiency of the railways of this country or their mismanagement had driven commerce to the Great Lakes.

It would be a peculiar economic policy, indeed, which would seek to supplant in either country these magnificent waterways as carriers of heavy traffic with railroad transportation at far greater cost to the community. Especially so in Europe, where those waterways are the work of centuries and represent untold expenditures. The development of this class of traffic by the railways of Prussia has been mainly in an effort to supplement the water transportation, particularly to points not well supplied in this respect. When it is remembered that the waterways are maintained for the use of commerce, it must be conceded that the dissemination of industry and the development of this commerce at interior points is greatly to the credit of Prussian railway management, in so far as it has been done at all. I have already shown how greatly this character of traffic has been developed by the Prussian railways.

While the Senator from Massachusetts recognizes that in all European countries a vast part of the bulky traffic is carried by waterways, he makes no allowance for this fact in his statements of average railroad freight rates. The figures which he offers for the foreign countries in comparison with ours represent entirely different traffic and entirely different services. To use the English statistics of railways, for instance, which the Senator himself says are not to any considerable extent reliable, in comparison with our statistics is only to draw unwarranted conclusions. The authority which he quoted, Mr. Ackworth, in a contribution to the Journal of the Royal Statistical Society a few years ago, affirmed that comparative statistics in which English statistics of railways are a basis of comparison are practically worthless. Here, too, the Senator omits all consideration of the vast differences in the character of the service in the two countries, the much shorter haul in England; that the English freight rate includes cartage and storage, and, finally, he ignores entirely the effect of the peculiar geographical situation of England. It has an area of only about 50,000 square miles, or less than the area of North Carolina, nearly completely surrounded by sea, so that, according to parliamentary testimony, perhaps three-fifths of all the shipping points within England are subject to influence of water transportation which naturally appropriates a large portion of the cheap, heavy traffic. Fundamental differences of this kind are ignored by the Senator throughout his argument and his comparisons with foreign countries.

Surely, in the face of all these fundamental differences in the traffic conditions, all of which tend to show that the comparisons are wrong and to discredit the conclusions sought to be deduced therefrom, no one will contend that such arguments prove that government regulation is a failure in Germany, nor elsewhere, where the arguments are based on like disregard of fundamental conditions.

With our widely different institutions, our complex system of State and National Government, our marvelously rapid growth and development, the intense struggle for wealth and industrial centralization which has recently taken place in this country, the control of transportation in the United States is distinctively an American problem.

Investigation into foreign systems of management may offer comparisons of value, but it will not afford a basis for solution of the questions confronting us.

There is one very important lesson to be learned from the most casual review of the European countries. The line of difference as to policy is between government ownership and the strictest government control. None of the progressive countries of Europe adopts the let-alone policy. No authority on the subject contends that the public interest should be left at the mercy of the selfish control of private corporations. In view of the protection afforded by foreign countries to the people from the monopoly of transportation, the mild, inadequate power conferred on the Commission by this bill seems hardly to the credit of our boasted free institutions. In view of our industrial condition, that this legislation should fail to express the full power of our Government, of our Congress, as the measure of relief, is the best evidence that the public good is not the governing consideration, and is outweighed by the very influences with which the Government should cope.

I do not believe government ownership either the necessary or the best solution of the transportation problem as it exists in the United States to-day. But, as I trust I have made clear, for my whole argument is based on that premise, I believe that the Government of the United States is bound to exercise all the power of a sovereign nation to the end that the regulation and control of its commerce shall be just and equitable, not only to shippers, but to the whole public. It is bound to see to it that the country is not handed over to monopoly and to selfish interests.

VALUATION OF RAILWAY PROPERTY NECESSARY AS A BASIS FOR ESTABLISHING REASONABLE RATES.

Mr. President, I now ask the Senate to consider more fully a recommendation of the Commission, to which I made brief reference yesterday.

This recommendation lies at the very foundation of any system of government regulation, which is to secure just and reasonable rates. Unless this recommendation be adopted, and the bill amended in conformity with it, the Senate and the country might as well understand that the railroads are to be permitted to continue to advance rates without let or hindrance.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do, sir.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that it is one of the purposes of section 15 of the pending bill to deal with rates that are unreasonably high.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I know of no reason why the Interstate Commerce Commission may not consider whether a rate complained of is excessive, and deal with it on that basis.

I further desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Committee on Interstate Commerce requested the Interstate Commerce Commission to send here a bill representing their matured convictions of what legislation ought to be had at this time, and that in the bill which they sent here the provisions for the valuation of all the railroads of the country did not appear, a circumstance which led me at least to think that the Commission, dealing with rates complained of as unreasonably high, if given the authority to reduce them would without further legislation be able to take into account the very question to which my friend refers.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am aware, as I suggested yesterday, Mr. President, that the Commission submitted a bill to the committees of Congress, as stated by the Senator from Iowa; but when you lay that bill side by side with the recommendations which they submitted in 1897, which they reaffirmed in 1898, which they declared imperative in 1899, which they said were necessary to the protection of commerce in 1900, which they said were essential in 1901, and 1902, and 1903, and 1904, and 1905—when anyone compares that bill with all of those recommendations it can only mean that, unable to get what is necessary to a regulation of commerce, they are finally constrained to ask for what they think they can get.

Mr. President, I said yesterday that gentlemen who have been here for years supporting the recommendations of the Commission have not hesitated to say that they accept this bill because it is the best they can get; that they hope it is the entering wedge, and that it would ultimately lead on to legislation which would meet the demands of the country. I am not permitted to report what has been said to me by others, but I may properly say this: That it is a fair inference, from a comparison of the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission with the bill which they submitted to the committees of this Congress, that the bill so submitted goes only as far as the Commission thought the committees and Congress would permit the legislation to go at present. They were apparently not far wrong, because the bill, as they originally submitted it, was pretty badly trimmed up before it got out of the House Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Now, Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do, sir.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Without undertaking to debate with the Senator from Wisconsin, I feel considerable interest in this bill, and I confess that I approached the subject in the present Congress from the standpoint of one who desired to have something done rather than from the standpoint of representing all my own views and opinions in respect to these propositions.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, when having "something done" means turning back the clock twenty years, when you reflect that in the last ten or fifteen years the industrial life of the people of the United States has been wholly changed, producer and consumer are oppressed, that the door of opportunity stands open no longer to individual enterprise, I say that legislation which only goes as far as the legislation of 1887 was understood to go (except as it embraces the private car companies and grants larger power with respect to publicity) is not "something" which the people of this country are entitled to have "done" at this time. I very much fear that simply getting a little "something done" is perhaps delaying for another ten years getting that which will liberate the industries and commerce of this country.

Now, Mr. President, I had started out to say, when interrupted, that the only restraint which will be interposed under the law, as proposed to be amended by this bill, will be that they will be required to keep the rates reasonably level. The rate line may be high, but it must be relatively just and equal.

And I think I will make it clear to the Senate that, under the bill as it stands to-day, rates can not be brought to the reasonable rate level, but only to the equal rate level—that is, the railway may impose any burden it pleases, provided the burden be reasonably distributed, the rates relatively equal.

There is a vast difference between reasonable rates and equal rates.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Why does my friend from Wisconsin ignore the fact that the bill is also framed for the purpose of preventing excessive rates?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let me ask my good friend from Iowa to be patient with me a little. I know it takes me quite a good while to make my points clear; I am inclined to be discursive; I know that; but if you will just bear me for a little while I believe I will make it plain to you that under this bill you can not get reasonable rates.

I know that there is a provision in it that says the Commission shall, upon a complaint being made, ascertain whether the rates are just or reasonable, but I purpose to show the Senate that it does not do that, and I was proceeding to say that there is a vast difference between reasonable rates and equal rates.

This bill is framed to enable the Commission to determine and enforce equal rates. It makes no provision for determining and enforcing reasonable rates.

Mr. President, what are just and reasonable rates? The Supreme Court has defined just and reasonable rates to be such rates as afford "just compensation." The railroad is entitled to "just compensation;" it is entitled to no more.

It was held in Smythe v. Ames (169 U. S., 546):

> The utmost that any corporation operating a public highway can rightfully demand at the hands of the legislature when exerting its general power is that it receives what, under all the circumstances, is such compensation for the use of its property as will be just both to it and to the public.

How shall this "just compensation" be ascertained? In the case of St. Louis and Santa Fe Railway Company v. Gill (156 U. S., 649) the court said:

> The effect on the entire line of railroad is the correct test of the reasonableness of rates of fare which are attacked as taking of property without "just compensation" or due process of law.

The Supreme Court gave us, in the case of Smythe v. Ames (supra) a very clear indication of the course to be pursued on the part of Government in determining reasonable rates. Mark the language:

> If a railroad corporation has bonded its property for an amount that exceeds its fair value, or if its capitalization is largely fictitious, it may not impose upon the public the burden of such increased rates as may be required for the purpose of realizing profits upon such excessive valuation or fictitious capitalization.
> If a corporation can not maintain such a highway and earn dividends for stockholders, it is a misfortune for it and them, which the Constitution does not require to be remedied by imposing unjust burdens upon the public.
> We hold that the basis of all calculations as to the reasonableness of rates to be charged by a corporation maintaining a highway under legislative sanction must be the fair value of the property being used by it for the convenience of the public. And, in order to ascertain the value, the original cost of construction, the amount expended in permanent improvements, the amount and market value of its bonds and stocks, the present as compared with the original cost of construction, the probable earning capacity of the property under particular rates prescribed by statute, and the sum required to meet operating expenses are all matters for consideration, and are to be given such weight as may be just and right in each case. We do not say that there may not be other matters to be regarded in estimating the value of the property.

The court does not attempt to fix the limits of the investigation which must be made in each case. To deal justly between the railroads and the public the Commission will necessarily take into account every fact and circumstance which is entitled to consideration in fixing just and reasonable rates for the road under investigation.

This, then, is the law which has been laid down by the Supreme Court. This is the test which will be applied whenever the Commission makes rates and the railroads resist their enforcement. The corporation will deny that they are lawful rates; that they are reasonable rates; that they will afford them just compensation for the services rendered. The Commission must meet proof with proof. Otherwise the railroad company will overwhelm it in court and set aside the rates prescribed. Manifestly the Commission must be prepared to prove the fair value of the property of the railroad, its receipts from all sources, the sum required to meet operating expenses, and the probable earnings under the rates prescribed.

The interstate-commerce law declares unreasonable rates unlawful. The Supreme Court held that it provided no way to enforce the orders of the Commission. This bill makes provision for enforcing the orders of the Commission with respect to reasonable rates, but it does not provide for ascertaining what are reasonable rates.

It authorizes the Interstate Commerce Commission to make an investigation upon complaint that rates are unreasonable, but when the Commission shall have exhausted all its power under the law as proposed to be amended by this bill, it will still be unable to determine whether the rates complained of are reasonable or unreasonable, except as compared with other existing rates, fixed by the railroads—the reasonableness of which are known only to the railroad company itself. Here the bill stops. It provides no specific method by which it is made the plain duty of the Commission to ascertain the reasonableness of rates based upon all the facts by which its determination will be tested by the court.

I contend, therefore, that preliminary to ascertaining the lawful rate—that is, the reasonable rate—the Commission must, as a basis for its work, know the value of the property of the corporation in question, its cost of operation, and all of the facts necessary to enable it to form a just judgment with respect to what shall constitute a reasonable profit on the investment. Without this the Commission can have no lawful standards with which to compare challenged rates. Without this the Commission is inevitably driven, in any case of complaint, to institute comparisons with other rates fixed by the railroads, having no knowledge whatever with respect to the reasonableness of the rate so selected for comparison. Neither the interstate commerce statute nor this proposed amendment makes any provision whatever under which the Commission is required to master the facts and secure the material for a foundation upon which to erect a standard of lawful or just and reasonable rates. If the statute is to provide no means of ascertaining the reasonable rate, then it were worse than folly to declare an unreasonable rate unlawful. No one will contend that the law of 1887, as amended by the acts of 1889 and 1891, confers specific authority upon the Commission and imposes upon it the duty to ascertain the value of railroad property in accordance with the rule laid down in Smythe v. Ames and other cases.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I must confess that my honored friend from Wisconsin, while he has relieved himself from the charge of being discursive, is very far from being conclusive.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, I have not got through yet by a good deal. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOLLIVER. The Senator paid, in the early part of his speech, a fine tribute to the Interstate Commerce Commission as to their exercise of the powers conferred upon them by the act of 1887, and has referred to several cases in which the Interstate Commerce Commission has actually reduced rates because they were unreasonable. Now, so far as my knowledge and investigations of this problem go, I do not see how much power the Interstate Commerce Commission would have to establish a standard after they knew the value of the railroad property.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am going to try to make that clear before I get through.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Because all parties agree that in dealing with individual rates we have no method of determining their relation to the cost of the railroads or the total earning of the railroads, certainly no method as to value; and I know of no reason, if you charge the Interstate Commerce Commission with the business of finding out whether a rate is just and reasonable, why they may not go into all these questions just as fully as a court could go into them in passing upon them.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, it seems to me that if the railroad commission were first furnished with accurate and reliable information as to the value of the entire railroad, then, measuring all the rates by that, it would be very easy by comparison to determine the value of any particular service or any single rate. If it is not possible to determine the reasonableness of any particular rate or whether any particular rate affords a just compensation, then this bill might as well never have been written, because it authorizes the Commission to do that. If it authorizes and empowers the Commission to perform an impossibility, it seems to me it needs correction along the line which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is now indicating.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has anticipated much that I should have said in reply to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER]. I think—I venture to say so again—that before we get through with this proposition it will be made plain that the bill is defective in this particular. It is certain that the Commission—I had just said this when I was interrupted, and I will have to go back and take up the thread of my argument.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; I do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator propose an amendment to the bill to remedy this defect which he alleges is in the bill?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I shall offer an amendment. I hope if any better amendment can be drawn, that some other Senator will offer one, but I shall offer an amendment to meet this particular fault in the bill and I hope such an amendment will be adopted. I believe the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] desires to see this bill a strong and effective measure. If it is made plain to him that such an amendment will add strength and efficiency to this bill, I am very certain he will give it his strong support.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I certainly sympathize with the notion of the Senator from Wisconsin that the Interstate Commerce Commission in passing upon what rates are just and reasonable will be governed by the considerations, in part at least, to which he has referred. For myself I do not doubt that in determining such a question they would deal with it exactly along the line suggested by the decision of the Supreme Court to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; Mr. President, but I think I shall be able to make it clear that they can not deal with it in that way without additional legislation. I shall prove to the Senate that the Commission appealed to Congress to give them the legislation under which they could make this valuation of the railroads as necessary to a proper basis of rate making under the decisions.

I have to resume the thread of my discourse. I had said that no one will contend that the law of 1887, as amended by the acts of 1889 and 1891, confers specific authority upon the Commission and imposes upon it the duty to ascertain the value of railroad property in accordance with the rule laid down in Smythe v. Ames and other cases.

The law of 1887 and the amendments proposed by this bill will invest the Commission with power to require of the railroads a full report with respect to the valuation of their property. But, Mr. President, that is not sufficient. The Government must not be compelled to accept the railroad company's statement of the value of its property, and stop with that. In addition to the railroad company's valuation the Government must be authorized to make a thorough and complete valuation. There is at the present time no law under which the Government can do that work.

It is certain, I say, that the Commission has never construed the law of 1887 as giving them authority to make a valuation of railroad property; and I say furthermore that Congress has never so construed the law, because Congress has never yet made an appropriation which would enable the Commission to proceed to do that thing. It is equally certain that the pending bill contains no specific provision granting such authority and imposing such a duty upon the Commission.

No one will argue that such an important duty should be left to doubtful construction or to be implied from other powers or obligations.

The bill should be so amended as to make it the duty of the Commission to proceed with this work of valuation, and Congress should make the necessary appropriation to carry it forward promptly. It should not be left optional as to whether this work shall be done or when it shall be done. There must be no obscurity or uncertainty about it. The broadest power should be granted. The employment of engineers, accountants, experts, practical and experienced men in every department of railroad engineering, construction, operation, and accounting should be authorized. The appropriation of whatever sum is necessary to inaugurate and vigorously prosecute this undertaking should be made at this session, and if it be required, it should be made mandatory on the Commission to act at once.

I shall offer an amendment to the pending bill, drawn with a view of giving the Commission full authority and imposing upon it the duty of ascertaining the value of the railway property of the United States, and reporting the progress upon the work at the beginning of each regular session of Congress. If we are desirous of giving the public assurance that Congress has taken hold of this subject with sincerity of purpose, that an intelligent, economic basis is to be established for thoroughly and justly dealing with the great interests involved, we shall embody such a provision in this law.

In its report for 1903 the Commission recommends additional legislation to enable the actual value of railroad property to be ascertained. It says:

> Among the subjects which deserve the attention of Congress is the need of a trustworthy valuation of railway property.

After devoting several pages to a presentation of the reasons which make it imperative to secure this information and the necessity of additional legislation to this end the discussion closes with the following:

> A large number of questions incident to the valuation of railway properties suggest themselves in addition to those which have been mentioned. This report can not, however, enter into further detail. Sufficient has been said to indicate the importance of an authoritative determination of railway values. It is respectfully recommended that Congress take this matter under advisement with a view to such legislative action as may be deemed appropriate.

Respecting the vital importance of ascertaining the reasonableness of rates the Commission in the report of 1903 says:

> To determine what are just and reasonable rates for public carriage is a governmental function of the highest utility. This is the central idea of regulation and the special field of its usefulness.

Oh, Mr. President, in the passing of a bill now to correct the errors of twenty years ago, surely we should not leave out the central idea of regulation.

Respecting the vital importance of ascertaining the value of railway property as the first step in determining the reasonableness of rates, the Commission says further, in the same report:

> No tribunal upon which the duty may be imposed, whether legislative, administrative, or judicial, can pass a satisfactory judgment upon the reasonableness of railway rates without taking into account the value of railway property.

The recent convention of State railway commissioners in this city favored the valuation of the railway property of the country. The Washington Post of April 5 says:

> The resolution offered Tuesday by Commissioner B. H. Meyer, of Wisconsin, declaring it to be the sense of the association that the Congress of the United States should authorize and direct the Interstate Commerce Commission or some other department of the Federal Government to ascertain the inventory value of all railways in the United States, and to fix a valuation on the railway property of each State separately, was adopted unanimously.

Now, I come to the point to which my friend from Iowa directed attention in one of his questions.

I do not claim that the Commission will be able to determine with mathematical exactness the cost of the service in shipping a single article carried with a mass of other freight. The traffic manager can not do that. But I contend that the Commission can ascertain the fair value of the property of the railroads; the cost of the maintenance and operation; the fair profit, interest, or return which it is entitled to receive, and the full amount which it does receive. I contend that upon this as a basis, giving due consideration to all other material circumstances, the Commission can determine reasonable rates that will afford the carrier "just compensation" for the services performed, and that with this knowledge the Commission would be able to form a just judgment—I do not say a mathematically exact determination of the cost, but a just judgment—with respect to a reasonable rate for a single shipment.

I contend that the Commission can in no other way determine a reasonable rate—a rate that is reasonable to the consumer, the man who pays the freight, that it can in no other way determine rates that are certain, if resisted by the railroad, to be sustained by the court.

I go further. I contend that it is the only way in which a fair approximation to justice can possibly be approached. The Government must deal fairly by the railroad, the shipper, the producer, and the consumer. This can not be done by a "first-come-first-served," "catch-as-catch-can" method of attacking a rate here and a rate there, giving a benefit to this man, an advantage to that community, while the railroad is free to recoup by advancing its rates on some other man or some other commodity. Awarding a complainant a rate adjudged to be reasonable, because it more nearly agrees with a rate which the carrier has established for some one else, is giving the complainant relative justice instead of real justice.

Mr. President, what is to be the result of this "hit-and-miss" method when you come to apply it in practice? Place in the hands of the Commission the power to enforce its orders, but withhold from them the authority and the means to get the actual value of railroad property, and by so doing the just basis for real instead of apparently reasonable rates, and what is almost certain to follow? The railroads must realize that every relatively low rate will at once become the basis by comparison for a complaint to reduce any rate which it can be judged ought to be equally low. They will for self-protection speedily advance the relatively low rates, in order to take away the standards which would be seized upon as a cause for complaint and a basis for the judgment of the Commission in ordering a reduction.

Indeed, so far as the shipper is concerned, this would be quite as satisfactory as an order of the Commission lowering his rate to the level of his more-favored competitor. It is of no concern to the shipper that he secure an absolutely reasonable rate. All he cares for is a relatively reasonable rate. He wants a rate equal to his competitor. He is quite as well satisfied if this be secured through raising his competitor's rate, as by lowering his own rate to the level of the competitor. Once invest the Commission with power to equalize rates and the complaining shipper will not find it necessary to apply to the Commission for equal rates. He will complain to the railroad company as less expensive and more expeditious. He will cite the fact that a competitor has an advantage in rates. The railroad, knowing that if the Commission is appealed to it may adjust the difference by lowering the higher rate, will promptly adjust it by advancing the rate of the competitor. What will the competitor do with this advanced rate? Excepting upon such articles as have a fixed and unvarying price in the trade, the competitor will simply add the increased freight charge to the price and pass it on to the jobber. The jobber will add it to the price to be paid by the retail merchant. The retail merchant will hand it over to the consumer as an added charge to his purchase. As the consumer can not pass it on, he must pay it himself.

If this bill is to have far-reaching results—if it is to protect the consumer as well as the shipper—then the foundation must be laid for ascertaining the reasonable rate; that is, on the rate which in and of itself is reasonable. The system of government regulation which is to have a just regard for the consumer must not be based on the relatively reasonable rate.

The ascertainment of the value of the railroads is the very corner stone of any great and enduring service which this legislation is to accomplish for the people of this country.

STATE VALUATIONS OF RAILROAD PROPERTY.

It can not be said in answer to this demand for a valuation of railway property that such a valuation is impossible or impracticable. In three notable instances such valuations of railway property have been made by States. In these cases every item of material and labor entering into the cost of the roadways and rolling stock of the roads have been enumerated and appraised. These valuations cover every mile of road within the States of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Texas. Obviously, a work that can be undertaken and accomplished by a State for all the lines within its boundaries can be accomplished by the Federal Government for the whole country. Furthermore, any work that is undertaken along this line in the future will have a great advantage in the knowledge obtained from the previous experience of these several States.

MICHIGAN AND WISCONSIN VALUATIONS.

The valuations of Michigan and Wisconsin were made for the purpose of assessment of ad valorem taxes. In each case the determination of physical values and nonphysical values were made separately. In each case the State had the benefit, in arriving at its valuation, of the cooperation of the railway companies themselves. In the Wisconsin valuation the initial appraisement was made by the roads, the State merely making such valuations and determinations as were necessary to verify and correct the valuations as made by the companies.

In the Wisconsin valuation the expense to the railroads was probably less than $11 per mile on the average. The Chicago and Northwestern Company spent an average of about $10.60 per mile on 1,784 miles of line. The average expense to the State for all lines did not exceed $7 per mile. It is safe, therefore, to predict that the total cost to both the Government and the roads of making such a valuation for the whole country, will not exceed $20 per mile, or for the entire mileage of the country considerably less than a total of $5,000,000. This amount, taken in consideration with the magnitude of the public interests depending on such valuation, is not a large sum. Its expenditure ought not to be in any degree a bar to the prosecution of so great and so necessary a public work.

The results of these valuations are an indication of what would be the results of a like valuation of the railway property of the country. So far as I have been informed there has been no protest against these valuations on the part of the railroads, except to contend that the valuations were too high. In the case of the Wisconsin valuation the values placed on the property by the roads were, in nearly every instance, increased by the board of assessment, and in some cases considerably increased.

I believe anyone who has ridden over the lines of Wisconsin or of Michigan will say that upon the average they are the equal of the lines of the country. I know that the two principal roads of Wisconsin, in the matter of curves and double track and ballast and equipment and everything that enters into railroad values, are the equals of the great trunk lines of this country.

The final determination of the average present value, per mile of line, by the States of Wisconsin and Michigan was as follows:

MICHIGAN, 1900.

7,813.27 miles, value per mile $21,396

WISCONSIN, 1903.

6,656.88 miles, value per mile 25,501

MICHIGAN AND WISCONSIN.

It is interesting to compare with the results of the Wisconsin valuation the average capitalized value per mile for a few of the leading companies.

The average value as determined by the company for the Saint Paul lines in the State (1,691 miles) was $26,340 per mile, and as finally fixed by the State, $30,004. The capitalization amounted at the same time to $33,321 per mile.

The company's valuation of the Omaha lines (737 miles) was $26,639 per mile, and the State placed it finally at $27,464. At the same time the floating capitalization was equal to $44,649 on the entire line (1,521 miles).

The average value of the Chicago and Northwestern road in Wisconsin (1,784 miles) as appraised by the railroad engineers was $25,382; as finally determined by the board of assessors, $29,063. The average capital per mile of this road for the year ending June 30, 1904 (which practically coincides with the time of the appraisement), was $32,180.

The Wisconsin Central appraised its property, three-fourths (723 miles) of which is in Wisconsin, at an average of $19,930 per mile. This valuation was increased by the State board to $22,711 per mile. The capitalization of this road per mile was $58,275, or about three times as much as its own valuation and over 250 per cent of its value, as determined by the State board.

To the appraised values of the railway property, there were added for taxation certain amounts to cover franchises, and the value of the property as an organized, going concern. But these additions would not properly be considered in determining a valuation for fixing rates.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask whether the valuation was made for taxation or for the purpose of regulating rates.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It was made for taxation. I shall later call attention to the basis of the capitalization per mile upon which the railroads have assessed rates to the people of Wisconsin for the last twenty-eight or twenty-nine years.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator whether he contends that the franchise should be valued as a part of the property of the corporation for purposes of taxation and should not be considered in the determination of rates. Did I understand him so to contend?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. As I shall presently show, there is a broad distinction upon economic principle to be made between the valuation of property for taxation and the valuation of the property of a public carrier for fixing rates.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And that one might include the value of the franchise and the other not?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, sir. Of course I will say in reply that it might be contended by a corporation that they ought to be allowed something for the franchise where they have "paid something to get it."

I recall one notable instance, the case of a street car company in Philadelphia, I believe, where the common council was about to vote the franchise to the street car company "for nothing." A protest went up from the citizens, and finally Mr. Wanamaker, I believe, wrote out his check for two and a half million dollars and sent it to the common council, saying, "Do not give this franchise away to the corporation. It is worth a good deal to the public. Make the corporation pay for it. I am not a railroad man and am not in the street-car business, but as an earnest of my belief that public franchises are worth something and ought to be paid for when they are secured by public-service corporations I tender my check for two and a half million dollars," I think it was. "Give me the franchise. I can turn it over to some corporation and make a good commercial transaction out of it."

I believe history records that the common council sent him back his check; did not sell him the franchise, but voted it to the public-service corporation "for nothing," at least, so far as is known. There might be cases, of course——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not believe for a moment that the value of the franchise ought to be considered in determining rates; but I am at a loss to know how it can be that it is not to be regarded as of value in the determination of rates and yet can be assessed for purposes of taxation. It strikes me that the true rule and the just rule would be to exclude it from consideration in the determination of both rates and taxes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I shall hope to recur to this subject again before I conclude my argument. For the present, if agreeable to the Senate, I will proceed for a little time, and then I shall ask that I may be permitted to discontinue for the day and continue my remarks on Monday.

It is a curious fact in railway conditions that the roads having the least value often have the greatest capitalizations. Capitalization merely reflects the policy of a particular management, or, more correctly, the series of managements through whose hands the road may have passed. It is quite apparent from these few Wisconsin examples that capitalization has no relation whatever to true value or investment.

It can not be objected that the foregoing valuations of railway property, embracing only the cost of the physical property, is not a sufficient basis for determining the value of the property on which the roads would be entitled to earn a profit. It may be cited that certain nonphysical elements of railway value should be added in determining the valuation on which profits are to be allowed, just as such additions were made to the physical valuations in Michigan and Wisconsin to determine a basis for taxation. A moment's reflection and consideration of the nature of these elements of nonphysical value will show that this contention is unsound.

General property is taxed, on the ad valorem basis, according to an assessment on its market value. It is obvious, therefore, that in order to tax railroad property on the same basis as general property a determination of all the factors entering into its commercial value must be had. It is perfectly clear that certain nonphysical elements, such as franchise and earning power, enter into this commercial value, and in determining a valuation for purposes of taxation an allowance for these elements is entirely proper.

But in determining a value on which profits are to be allowed this is not the case. The determination of these nonphysical values for the Michigan valuation was made by Mr. H. C. Adams, of Michigan University, and statistician of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The bases of this valuation have been made public. While the method of this determination is somewhat involved, it is based in the final analysis on the amount of the net earnings which the carrier is earning over and above 4 per cent on the value of the physical property. In other words, the nonphysical value of railroad property is, in the last analysis, the value of its power to charge excessive rates for transportation. It is quite obvious that this value can not properly be included in a valuation made as a basis for determining reasonable rates.

Furthermore, a consideration of all the elements on which a nonphysical value can be based, as enumerated by Mr. Adams in his work, does not reveal any element entering into such valuation which is in any sense an investment on which the carrier has a right to demand a profit.

TEXAS RAILWAY VALUATION.

The valuation of railway property by the State of Texas possesses a particular interest because its primary purpose was the regulation of railroad capitalization and charges. The constitution of the State of Texas, as well as particular statutory enactments, prohibit fictitious railway capitalization. The railroad commission law of that State provides that the commission shall "ascertain, and in writing report to the secretary of state, the value of each railroad in this State, including all its franchises, appurtenances, and property."

The Hon. John H. Reagan, chairman of the railroad commission of Texas, testifying before the industrial commission, described the work of the commission in valuing the Texas railroads. The investigations of the commission as to the cost of the many items entering into the roads was most thorough and comprehensive. Liberal allowances were made to cover the cost of procuring franchises and defraying the expenses of engineering, as well as to cover interest on the investment during the time of construction. When the valuation was finally determined, it was noticed to the several companies and forty days' time given in which such valuation might be contested. Said Mr. Reagan:

> We have done this in every case of valuation, and not one of our valuations of all the railroads of Texas has been contested. By our plan of valuation, if contested, we could ask what item in it was complained of, and from our files show the proof on which it was based.

Under this valuation the value of all the railroads of Texas constructed prior to 1893 had been, at the time of Mr. Reagan's testimony, finally determined by the commission. The average value per mile of all these roads was $15,759. The aggregate value of all the roads so valued amounted on the 30th of June, 1899, to $141,157,176. The aggregate capitalization of the railroad companies, stocks and bonds, was $362,953,383, or more than two and one-half times the actual value. (This excessive capitalization was created prior to the passage of the stock and bond law, 1893.)

I say the actual value, because when these companies were served with a notice that this valuation of a little over $15,000 a mile had been fixed for each mile of their road in that State, and when they knew that that valuation was to be made the basis of the rates which they were to be permitted to collect on the traffic of that State, they never appeared to contest the valuation. So it may be accepted, it seems to me, as an admission on the part of the railroads that up to that time it was a fair valuation of their property within the State of Texas.

Since the date of this valuation considerable improvements have been made on the old lines. A liberal estimate of the cost of these improvements, by the engineer of the commission, is from $4,000 to $8,000 per mile. These roads are fairly representative as to cost for railroads generally in the Southwest. And it is safe to say that the average actual cost of all the roads in that section did not exceed $25,000 per mile, and in fact was probably very much less.

In valuing new roads at the present time the policy of the commission is a very liberal one, so that the present valuation is almost without exception in excess of the actual cost of the road. A new road recently valued comprises 300 miles of one of the principal lines of the International and Great Northern Railroad Company. This piece of railroad is in every respect modern, and the grade has been reduced to the maximum of three-tenths of 1 per cent, and the road will carry the heaviest equipment. With heavy grading and the usual number of bridges and culverts, the actual cost of constructing and equipping this road with the best modern equipment was from $25,000 to $27,000 per mile.

Will it be said that this policy of ascertaining the physical value of all railway property of the United States will be too expensive? Governments, like individuals, may be penny wise and pound foolish. The Senate voted at this session to spend $2,600,000 a year for ship subsidies. Shall we hesitate to provide all that is necessary to place the regulation of railways on a solid foundation, and to lift the great burden of extortionate charge from the consumer.

In the creation of a railroad commission and tax commission in Wisconsin, and in the effort to compel the railroads to pay their proportionate taxes, there was the constant objection of the expense. But the results have already saved thousands of dollars where one has been expended. And what has been already saved is small in comparison with what will follow from the exercise of the power of the State vested in a commission to protect the citizens of Wisconsin from overcharges and favoritism to persons and places.

Mr. President, in concluding upon this branch of the subject I will venture to say that the question will never be settled in this country until it is settled upon a basis of the fair valuation of the railroad property of the country. I believe that we should start now and start right in clothing this Commission with full authority to ascertain this basis for establishing reasonable rates.

I will now yield the floor with the hope that I may conclude my remarks on Monday.

Monday, April 23, 1906.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, when I surrendered the floor on Friday afternoon I had brought the discussion up to the point of a consideration of existing rates. I think I had shown that rates which are really reasonable rates can not be established and enforced without first ascertaining the true value of the property of the railroads as a basis for fixing the reasonable rates which will yield a fair return upon the property of the railroad company.

I now propose to show, sir, that railway rates in this country are at the present time excessive.

I know it is urged on all sides that rates are reasonable; that no reductions of importance will be necessary under any law which we may enact; that the important consideration for this body is to frame legislation that will insure equality of rates rather than reasonable rates; that no reductions of importance being required, there will be no necessity for a provision in this bill for the valuation of railway property and no necessity of expending the money and the labor necessary to secure that valuation.

The President has been quoted as saying in at least one public address that "there has been comparatively little complaint to me of the railroad rates being actually too high." Members of the Commission have been quoted as saying that complaint is made against unequal rather than against unreasonable rates, and Senators upon both sides of this debate have repeatedly declared that there is little complaint as to unreasonable rates, but that the chief complaint is against discrimination. Granting this, it establishes nothing except the wide prevalence of complaint as to unjust discrimination. It does not seem to have occurred to anybody that this proves nothing with respect to the reasonableness of existing rates.

Can anyone fail to see that there is small chance for the public to know whether rates are reasonable or extortionate? The whole matter is in the hands of the carriers. They have the facts upon which to predicate any approach to exact knowledge. If anyone knows the actual value of their property, they know it. They know the actual cost of operation, and they make the rate without check or hindrance. Is there any reason to suppose that they do not charge all the traffic will bear?

We have complaints on all sides of discriminations in violation of law and at the risk of heavy penalties. The railroads can make rates unreasonably high without fear of any punishment. Is it to be believed that they are guilty of violating the law against discrimination by rebates and otherwise, risking all the penalties it imposes, and that they fail to charge all the traffic can bear when there is not the slightest danger of punishment for so doing?

Ah, but why, then, is it that we have complaint of discrimination in almost every community, and no complaints of unreasonably high charges? It seems to me that the reason is so obvious as scarcely to require statement. There is a standard of comparison in one case. There is none in the other. Complaint is made of discriminations because the rate paid in one instance can be compared with the rate paid in another. There is some basis for comparison, and strong incentive for complaint. But what standard have we for comparison by which to test the question whether rates are too high? What information has the shipper, the producer, the consumer, upon which to base complaint? He does not know what profit the carrier is making. All of the facts essential to form a judgment and lodge a complaint are beyond his reach. Because he formulates no complaint, prosecutes no action, proves neither that he is satisfied nor that he is without cause for complaint.

Give the public some criterion, based upon the rules laid down by the Supreme Court, then it will know whether its rate is just and reasonable, then it will be prepared to resist wrong. Make it the bounden duty of this Commission, arm it with full authority, furnish it ample assistance and money necessary to ascertain the actual value of railroad property, the actual cost of operation, and all the facts upon which to base a standard of reasonable rates. If complaints do not follow, it will then mean something when the President, the Commission, or anybody else says that there are "few complaints with respect to high rates."

But, Mr. President, I venture to say that rates are unreasonably high, and that if the opportunity is ever presented to ascertain the value of railroad property, it will result in markedly reducing transportation charges generally throughout the country. Before offering the direct evidence that rates have enormously advanced throughout the country in the last few years I wish to offer some significant testimony, dating from the Granger legislation.

Illinois established a warehouse and railway commission with authority to fix maximum rates in 1873. The commission appointed under this law established and has maintained a schedule of transportation charges. Iowa, in 1888, enacted a law creating a commission authorized to make rates. This commission promulgated a complete schedule of railway charges for that State. No effort has ever been made to amend this legislation, and the railway companies have acquiesced in the rates established by the commission. Under the law the carriers could have gone into court in Illinois or Iowa, attacked and set aside the rates fixed by these two commissions, if it had been possible for them to make it appear that such rates were unreasonable and that they did not afford just compensation for the services rendered. That the rates established by this commission have stood unchallenged by the railroad companies in both States through all the years, must be taken as an admission on the part of the railroads that the rates are not open to complaint on their part.

Wisconsin lies immediately north of Illinois and east of Iowa. In 1874 a law was enacted in Wisconsin fixing maximum rates and creating a commission authorized to make changes in the same from time to time. Two years later the railroads secured control of the legislature and repealed that law. From that time until 1905, or for a period of twenty-nine years, these corporations have been powerful enough to defeat all legislation to regulate transportation charges in that State. We have, therefore, an opportunity to compare rates in Wisconsin, where the railroads have controlled for twenty-nine years, with rates in Illinois and Iowa, where they have been controlled and established by State authority. This comparison offers, therefore, I submit, a most excellent test as to whether railroad companies may be trusted, when left without supervision and control, to make rates with due regard to the public interests.

The two principal railroads in Wisconsin are the Chicago and Northwestern and the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul. These railway lines likewise run through the States of Illinois and Iowa. With a view to instituting comparison between the railroad-made rates of Wisconsin and the State-made rates of Illinois and Iowa I arranged all the stations on the St. Paul road and all the stations on the Northwestern road in Wisconsin in tables, showing the number of miles to each station from the principal market. From the published schedules of the railroad companies I obtained and placed in the tables opposite the name of each station the cost of shipping in and out every class and kind of freight, whether in carload lots or less than carload lots, including commodity rates, between each station and its principal market within the State. I then placed side by side with the Wisconsin rates, Iowa rates, fixed by the Iowa commission, for the shipment, in like manner of an equal quantity of the same kind of freight the same distance in that State. The rates for a like number of stations in Illinois equally distant from market in each case with the Iowa and Wisconsin stations were next obtained and incorporated into the table.

I was then in a position to ascertain the exact difference between the so-called "reasonable rates" established for Wisconsin by the railroads without State regulation with the reasonable rates established under State control in Iowa and Illinois. The comparison thus worked out clearly demonstrated that the railroad companies were exacting from the people of Wisconsin from 20 to nearly 70 per cent higher rates than they received in Iowa and Illinois for a like and equal service. I may add that the rates in Illinois have been considerably reduced by the commission of that State since these comparisons were made, as is shown by the following telegram recently received in response to an inquiry which I addressed to Governor Deneen:

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., April 1, 1906.

Hon. R. M. LA FOLLETTE,
Washington, D. C.:

Twenty per cent reduction was made on first five classes on December 5, 1905, went into effect on January 1, 1906. No railroad has appealed to the courts against it. Commission has under consideration question as to whether reduction should be made in remaining five classes.

CHARLES S. DENEEN.

So Senators will see that in view of the reduction recently made in the Illinois rates, as stated by Governor Deneen, it is clearly manifest that the Illinois rates, with which I instituted comparison, in 1903, were themselves above the reasonable rate level. Furthermore, it should be borne in mind that the Iowa rates were instituted as maximum reasonable rates in 1888, and since that time there has been no substantial reduction. But there have been enormous increases in the traffic and in the carrying efficiency of the roads which naturally result from the industrial development of a great and rapidly growing State like Iowa. As a consequence of these changes, the cost of handling the traffic has decreased, and rates that yielded a fair profit in 1888 yielded more than a fair profit in 1903, when I used these rates as a standard of comparison to test the reasonableness of rates in Wisconsin. Notwithstanding the fact, Mr. President, that the Illinois and Iowa rates were without doubt higher than a reasonable standard, the Wisconsin rates, over which there was no State control, were higher than the Illinois and Iowa rates by 20 to 70 per cent.

Whether the rates in Iowa and Illinois are reasonable in themselves is known only to the railroad companies in those States. Neither the commission of Iowa nor the commission of Illinois ascertained the value of the railroad property of their respective States, thus establishing a basis upon which to fix rates reasonable per se. As before stated, that they are, on the whole, considerably above the reasonable rate line, may be safely assumed; otherwise the railroads would have brought action to set them aside as not offering just compensation for the services performed.

I have cited these comparisons because they prove conclusively that it is never safe to assume that the railroads uncontrolled make reasonable rates.

It might have been possible to furnish proof that the railroad-made rates of Wisconsin were unreasonably high without going into the other States for comparison. But few States in the Union are more richly endowed than Wisconsin with magnificent water powers. With her splendid waterways well distributed over the State, her wealth of raw material for diversified manufacturing near at hand, her factories would naturally be so located as to utilize the free power furnished by nature.

But with the defeat of all effort to reestablish State control of railway rates, the only check upon excessive transportation charges for the whole Commonwealth is that afforded by the water transportation of the Great Lakes system. Nineteen of the seventy-two counties of Wisconsin border upon Lakes Michigan and Superior. For three hundred miles along her lake shore many splendid natural harbors offer water communication with the outside markets. Along the lake shore, through these nineteen counties, the railroad rates have always responded to water competition, and rule much lower than rates in the interior of the State. It is a significant fact that more than seventy per cent of the capital invested in manufacturing in Wisconsin is located in the nineteen counties situated on Lakes Michigan and Superior. Except for the fact that water transportation influences to their advantage freight charges by rail, these nineteen counties afford no better location for manufacturing plants than most of the other counties of the State, where are located the abundant supplies of raw materials and magnificent water powers. Indeed, many excellent water powers have been abandoned and hundreds left undeveloped because the high freight rates in the interior have forced nearly three-quarters of the manufacturing into a little more than one-fourth of the lake shore counties of the State.

Mr. President, there is no warrant for the belief that people of the country are, upon the whole, enjoying reasonable rates. This view has been skillfully engrafted upon the credulous public. But, sir, the known facts demonstrate its falsity. The Supreme Court has determined that the carrier is entitled to a fair profit, based upon a fair valuation of his property. Is this the basis upon which the railroads fix their charges to-day? By no means.

No one will deny that, at the outset, they bond and stock their properties away in excess of a fair value. Then they tax transportation to pay a "fair return" on this inflated value. From that time forward, as rapidly as the traffic can possibly bear the burden, additional stocks and bonds are issued without additional investment, and transportation is further taxed to pay a "fair return" upon this added inflation. Again and again this process is repeated. It is an endless-chain system.

I again offer a specific illustration furnished by recent history in Wisconsin of the imposition of excessive charges for transportation by railroads. It happened that while the State was making an effort to ascertain the fair value of railway property, for the purpose of enforcing the just taxation of such property, it was at the same time prosecuting an investigation of transportation charges and railway earnings as a basis for legislation to regulate rates.

The average annual net earnings for the Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company on its Wisconsin traffic, as stated in its official report to the State, amounted to $3,919 per mile. The net earnings thus amount to a 6 per cent income on $65,317 per mile. In other words, the people of Wisconsin were paying freight charges which netted the Northwestern Railway Company 6 per cent on $65,317 a mile. The State board of assessment, authorized by statute to ascertain the value of the railroad property of the State as a basis for taxation, notified the Northwestern Railway Company to submit the valuation of its property to such board. This it did.

The fair valuation of the property of the Northwestern Railway Company in Wisconsin was thus shown by the corporation to amount to $25,382 per mile.

The average net earnings for the St. Paul Railway Company in Wisconsin for the same period amounts to 6 per cent on $62,633 per mile. Wisconsin traffic was therefore charged at a rate high enough to produce a net income upon $62,633 per mile. This company, when called upon by the board of assessment to furnish the true value of its property for taxation, submitted such statement, by which the road proved the value of its property in the State to be $26,340 per mile.

Mr. President, nothing could be more conclusive as evidence of the fact that railroads are charging the people rates high enough to pay interest and dividends on more than twice the fair value of their property.

TRANSPORTATION CHARGES ADVANCING.

With the carriers free from any governmental supervision of their charges, and with all restraints of competition eliminated by combination, the natural and inevitable result is the advance of transportation charges to the public. The experience of the past few years shows how unwise it is, in the absence of these positive restraints, to rely upon the railroads to interpret the "laws of business" in the interests of the country and the industrial development of the communities which they serve.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Were these railroads actually capitalized up to sixty-two or sixty-five thousand dollars a mile?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No, they were not in this particular instance—that is, two were not—but they were capitalized some thousands of dollars per mile more than they gave as their true value. Another road in Wisconsin was capitalized at nearly the sum mentioned. I simply used that illustration in this connection to show to the Senate and the country, taking these two leading roads of Wisconsin, that it is never safe to trust the railroads to fix reasonable rates.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I understand that point. But the point to which my mind was going was that made by the Senator immediately preceding this, to wit, that here there had been the issuance by a railroad company of stocks and bonds beyond anything that justified it, as the Senator said, and then the assessment of rates to pay dividends upon that overcapitalization.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Assuming that to be true, has the Senator thought out any remedy for it? That is to say, suppose a railroad company has issued stock far beyond what it should have issued, far beyond the value of the road; that those stocks are bought by the innocent public, by innocent holders, and are held by them as an investment, and that in order to pay dividends upon those stocks the railroad charges what the Senator claims are excessive rates. Has the Senator thought out any remedy for that situation?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think as I progress in this discussion it will be apparent to my friend, the Senator from Indiana, what the real remedy is so far as all the people of this country are concerned.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I did not mean to anticipate the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I understand.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think every person who has given any attention at all to the question of overcapitalization and the assessment of charges to pay dividends upon the overcapitalization has been confronted at the very outset by the difficulty which is presented by the fact that the securities are held by an innocent public on the one hand, and on the other hand the innocent public are paying the overcharges. I thought perhaps the Senator had thought out a remedy for that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think, if I may anticipate in just a sentence what I intend to say a little more fully later on, the Supreme Court has suggested an answer to the question of my distinguished friend from Indiana, and that is this: If a railroad line has had issued bonds and stocks away in excess of the investment of the fair value of the property, the public can not justly be taxed to pay dividends upon stock and interest upon bonds thus issued. In other words, the old rule that puts every man when he makes a purchase upon his inquiry as to the value of the property he purchases requires that the man buying stocks and bonds shall know whether there is back of those stocks and bonds in which he invests his money that value which is specified on their face.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator will permit me further, it would strike me right here that in the matter of fixing railway rates would come the question of just compensation, or even of confiscation.

Mr. TILLMAN. We are interested in this discussion, and I suggest that the Senator from Indiana raise his voice a little.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will.

Mr. TILLMAN. And that he change his position so that his voice will be sidewise to us instead of his back being to us. We should like to hear what he is saying.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I was addressing the Senator from Wisconsin. However, I will try to comply with the suggestion of the Senator from South Carolina.

Suppose that here is the overcapitalization to which the Senator refers, and rates are based upon it in order to pay dividends upon that capitalization. This overcapitalization has been absorbed by the innocent purchasing public. Upon the theory that the railroads should charge rates which would pay a fair return upon the actual just value of the road no dividends whatever would be paid upon the overcapitalization. Therefore, when such rates were fixed, the road would at once say "this is the taking of property without just compensation." That is the point to which I wish to direct the Senator's attention.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In response to that question the Supreme Court would say, as it has said heretofore, that it is not required of the public to pay dividends and interest on water, no matter who owns it, but that it shall pay dividends and interest on the fair value of the property, and nothing more. The Supreme Court has said that if any railroad company has issued stock and bonds in excess of the fair value of its property it must suffer, and those who hold the stock and bonds must suffer the consequences of such action; that it is unjust to impose that burden upon the public. If railroad companies are to be permitted to issue stocks and bonds without limit, if there is to be no restriction whatever, and none has been imposed except in the State of Texas, so far as I am advised——

Mr. DOLLIVER. And Massachusetts.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Massachusetts; yes. There is State regulation in Massachusetts, but with these exceptions the directors of a railroad company may, without any limitation whatever, burden the public with transportation charges to pay interest and dividends, not upon capital invested in the business of transportation, but upon any figure they choose to put upon the paper certificates they issue.

Mr. MALLORY. May I ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. MALLORY. I understood the Senator, a while ago, to refer to the case of a reduction of 20 per cent in the rates on certain classes of freight in Illinois. Was that contested?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; and I am informed by Governor Deneen that there has been no intimation on the part of the railroad companies that they would go into court and contest this further reduction of rates in Illinois.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. In considering the question as to the attitude of innocent purchasers of overcapitalized stocks to this question, does not the fact that thus far Congress has been absolutely apathetic and indifferent as to legislation upon this subject, and whilst it has had the power, has never yet taken steps to check overcapitalization, prevent us from legislating in such a way as to deprive these innocent purchasers of overcapitalized stock of revenue upon their investment?

In this connection let me suggest to the Senator further, that the Supreme Court, in laying down the rule which shall govern regulating bodies in the determination of rates, has announced that the right of the corporation is to have a fair return upon a fair valuation of its property. But in treating of the question of valuation the Supreme Court has indicated, in Smyth v. Ames, that the Commission can take into consideration not only the mere cost of reproduction, but can also take into consideration the amount of stocks and bonds issued, and can also take into consideration the income received by the corporation from the existing rates. It indicates that these things ought to be considered, and that many other things might be considered in reaching a valuation.

Will the Senator bear with me a moment longer? I think this is a very important question, and I am quite in sympathy with his general view. I believe we should have a valuation of the railways, and I believe the railroad companies should be confined in the future to a fixed percentage upon that valuation; and I believe if we can only have a fair valuation now, even if it includes these excessive issues, even if it is a valuation based upon excessive rates, if we can have a starting point now and protect ourselves against overcapitalization in the future, we will do a great service to the entire country.

But we should bear in mind, upon this question of capitalization, that the total capitalization of all the roads in the country, in bonds and stocks, is about six billions and a half in bonds and six billions and a half in stock, and that that is approximately in bonds per mile a little over $30,000 and in stock per mile a little over $30,000. If the valuation in all of the States is based upon the cost of reproduction, it means that the value of all the roads of the country will be put at just about the amount of the existing bonds, namely, six billions and a half, and then, if we should allow the roads a fair rate of interest upon the $6,000,000,000, sufficient to pay the interest upon the bonds, there would be hardly anything, perhaps nothing, left to the stockholders. Can we contemplate the entire obliteration of 6,000,000,000 of stock throughout the entire country, and turn over these roads to the bondholders, and would not the readjustments created by a destruction of those great values be more serious in consequences than the reduction of rates would be a benefaction to the country?

There is just another suggestion, and that is when these railroads were started, what rate of interest would we have allowed had we limited the return by law? Probably 10 per cent, as we did in the case of the Union Pacific Railroad.

Now, 10 per cent upon $6,000,000,000, the actual cost of reproducing these roads, would yield just $600,000,000 net, and that is the amount that all the railroads now realize, after the payment of operating expenses and taxes. It would be entirely fair to value these roads at the absolute cost of reproduction, if we allow them the rates of interest prevailing at the time the enterprises were inaugurated, and if that were 10 per cent, it would yield these companies $600,000,000 annually, just as it does now, and 10 per cent paid upon $6,000,000,000 of valuation would immediately make the market value about $12,000,000,000, which is approximately the present capitalization in bonds and stocks of all the railroads of the country.

The value of all these securities is based upon the prevailing rates of interest. To-day if a share of stock, representing $100 par value, receives dividends at the rate of 10 per cent it immediately doubles in its market value to $200, whereas thirty years ago 10 per cent would simply have held the stock at par.

I will state that I have put in an amendment for the valuation of roads, and I believe in it, for the cost of reproduction is a factor in the determination of rates. Yet the Interstate Commerce Commission, it seems to me, following this rule laid down in Smyth v. Ames, should have some regard to the actual value of bonds and stocks and should have regard to the high rates of interest prevailing when these enterprises were inaugurated and should value the roads at approximately the market value of the stocks and bonds and, taking that as a basis, fix the future rate of interest so low—say, 4 or 5 per cent—as to give the entire country the benefit of the gradual reduction of rates resulting from the large increase in the business which is certain to occur.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I will endeavor to recall the question my friend the Senator from Nevada propounded at the beginning of his remarks, which bears upon the rights of the "innocent purchaser." I will say, with reference to that question, I know of no reason, sir, why a different rule should be applied to the man who purchases railway stocks or railway bonds than the rule which is applied to every man who makes a purchase of any kind of property in this country. Any man who purchases other kinds of property, if he goes into court to contend that he has paid more than that property is worth, is confronted with the rule of law that he who buys must inquire as to the value of the property he buys.

Railway stocks and bonds are purchased for the purposes of speculation quite largely. There is always the element of speculation in the investment which induces the purchaser to take some chances. Is there any reason why the men who invest in railway stocks should have applied to them and to their investments a different rule than the man who purchases a farm or a horse or any other piece of property? That would certainly be very unjust.

I say, therefore, that those who hold railway stocks and bonds in the United States to-day hold them under the rule of law which requires them to know that they have invested their money in property which is worth the purchase price.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do, sir.

Mr. MONEY. Sympathizing entirely with the Senator from Wisconsin, I should like to ask him a question right at this point. Has Congress or the legislature any authority to make any inquiry into the value of the road except for the purpose of one of two things—one to fix the rate of taxation and the other to fix the rate of tariff for carriage? If Congress should undertake to investigate that subject with any view whatever of protecting the investor in railway stocks and bonds and investments in their property, has Congress any authority whatever to do it?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Most assuredly not. And no government has either the legal or the moral right to impose upon its people the payment of transportation charges upon any other basis than that suggested by the interrogatory of the Senator from Mississippi—the fair value of the property of the carrier.

When the opposition raise the question of the confiscation of watered stocks and bonds, I remind them that every dollar taken from the people who pay the freight which goes to pay interest and dividends on overcapitalization, is taking exactly that much more than "just compensation" for the transportation service, and is a confiscation of the money—that is, the property—of the people, the innocent public who are thus overtaxed on transportation.

I now remember that I did not answer one question asked by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. He asks, If Congress has heretofore neglected its duty in respect to this matter, are we not committed to policies which have been pursued by other Congresses? That is, if Congress in the past has failed in its duty to the public, are we not, therefore, bound to continue to impose burdens on the generations to come? Are we not bound to follow the bad precedent of violation of public trust? I say no, sir; most positively no.

We have a duty——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I beg the Senator's pardon. We have a duty to perform, a present duty. We should faithfully execute the public trust for those who have commissioned us to protect their interests without respect to the violations of obligation of which any preceding Congress may have been guilty.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do, sir.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator from Wisconsin has misapprehended me if he thinks I claim that we are committed at all to the policy which has hitherto prevailed. My query was as to values built up in this country in the market on an income of these railroads permitted by Congress when it had the regulating power, and those values now in the hands of innocent purchasers, people who had nothing whatever to do with the overcapitalization, whether that does not constitute a consideration which would prevent us from taking action that would absolutely obliterate the $6,000,000,000 of value in this country so held.

Mr. MONEY. They are not values.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will simply say in answer, as suggested by the Senator from Mississippi, that they are not values, and that the people who made the purchases were bound to know whether they were buying water or buying property of value.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; but the Senator——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am very anxious to conclude to-day, if I can.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will take only a second.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield further to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do, sir.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am not talking now about the par value of the overcapitalized stock, but the market values, and the Senator must recollect that these values are built up and based on the revenues of the companies; that the companies enjoy their revenue from rates, and that these rates have been fixed by these common carriers with the sanction or permission or as the result of the inaction of Congress. We gave them the right, in the first place, to fix their own rates and placed no restriction upon their charges, and we never yet have exercised the absolute power of fixing rates. So the rates were rates fixed under the law and the income had its basis upon lawful rates, even though they might have been excessive, and the present market value is based on such income.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the income did not have its basis upon lawful rates. An unreasonable or excessive rate has always been an unlawful rate. Without any action upon the part of Congress, every unreasonable rate at common law was an unlawful rate. Because these corporations may have been able to prevent Congress, derelict in its duty, from enacting legislation which would protect the public against extortion, are we forever to continue giving sanction and approval to the great wrong? I say, Mr. President, that the market value of the water in securities represents the power to charge extortionate rates to the public, and nothing more. There can be no "innocent purchaser" of a share in the proceeds of this unjust and unlawful extortion.

No, sir. If we undertake to follow such a precedent as that I venture to suggest to my friend that there will come a Senate and a House of Representatives commissioned directly from the people who will better represent the public interest.

Mr. President, I was just saying when interrupted that the experience of the past few years shows how unwise it is in the absence of these positive restraints to rely upon the railroads to interpret the "laws of business" in the interest of the country and the industrial development of the communities which they serve.

The menace of combination of carriers has been called to the attention of Congress by the Interstate Commerce Commission from the beginning. The advances in rates were predicted, and when they were made they were announced by the Commission. The report of the Commission for 1900 contained the following warning:

> It is idle to say that freight rates can not be advanced. During the past year they have been, by concerted action upon a vast volume of traffic, advanced in every part of the country. It is equally idle to say that they will not be advanced. It is both human nature and the lesson of history that unlimited power induces misuse of that power.

Again, in its report to Congress in 1903, the Commission said:

> One of the most significant things in recent railway operation is the steady advance of the cost of transportation of freight by rail. A few years ago the impression was general that freight rates could not, and would not, be advanced. Railway traffic officials frequently affirmed this in testimony. When the Commission had under consideration certain consolidations of railway property, the eminent gentleman who brought them about stated, under oath, that the purpose was not to advance, but rather to reduce rates. Recent history belies these predictions.

This statement was followed in the report by specific statements of these advances in rates. It was pointed out that in a few instances class rates had been advanced so as to be higher than ever before in the history of the Commission. To quote the Commission:

> The rates upon those commodities that constitute the bulk of interstate traffic have been advanced in nearly all sections. Coal rates have almost without exception been increased. The same is true of iron schedules. Rates upon grain and its products, lumber, live stock and its products are generally higher to-day than four years ago.

Advances had been effected by the advance of hundreds of important commodities in the classification and also by the classification of traffic formerly given reduced commodity rates.

In the evidence taken before the committees of Congress there is a great body of complaint against such advances in rates. In all this complaint there is the underlying idea that the rates are advanced to the point of unreasonableness. Of course the complainant is not in a position to prove that rates are in fact unreasonable because Congress has never provided for a valuation of railway property. When that is done these people will demonstrate that their rates are unjustly high. The conditions represented, however, merit the consideration of those who have not yet heard any complaint of rates unreasonable per se. These complaints represent, among others, the great agricultural interests of the Central States, the great cattle interests of the West, the great lumber interests of the South, and the great paramount interest of the whole consuming public.

The advances in rates are in force in every section of the country. They are in force on nearly every important article of freight shipment. Many of them were put in force through advances of articles in the classifications. Of the three classifications covering the country one shows 572 commodities so advanced another 531, and the third 240. In addition to these advances there were very great advances in commodity rates on several important articles of shipment, such as iron and steel, soft coal, and lumber. Besides these advances in rates the public burden has been increased by the greatly increased cost of transportation by private-car and refrigerator companies.

Among the commodities advanced in the official classification, hay was advanced from sixth to fifth class. The representative of the National Hay Association declared that this advance made the rates on hay prohibitive for long distances, and in effect practically excluded the hay crop of the North Central States from the Eastern markets. The change in the classification advanced the rate on hay, Chicago to New York, for instance, $1 per ton. The average advance is estimated by the Interstate Commerce Commission at 80 cents, which, applied to the annual tonnage effected, equals a total annual advance of $2,434,000, or a total to the date of the statement of about $10,000,000, and if continued to the present time $15,000,000. This is the result of only one of the 572 advances in one classification.

Another commodity similarly advanced in classification is sugar. The people have paid out, because of this advance, from $5,000,000 to $6,000,000 more than they would have paid if the advance had not been made.

Of course, this advance does not make much difference in the homes where incomes are large and luxury prevails. But, Mr. President, the additional burden falls with great weight upon the little homes, for a few dollars, more or less, is a matter of great importance in the strict economy which is necessary to the very existence of the home life.

The most vigorous complaint before the Congressional committees against advances and overcharges in freight rates was that made by the live-stock associations.

I suppose, Mr. President, it was vigorous because the live-stock associations represent large interests and are able to present their cases strongly and fight them out before the Congressional committees and the Interstate Commerce Commission.

These excessive rates for the transportation of live stock vitally affect the prosperity of the whole agricultural West. The agriculture of nearly all of this whole section derives the largest part of its money income from the sale of live stock. Live stock is the most valuable single finished product of the whole agricultural industry. It constitutes about 12 per cent of the total tonnage of the traffic of the western roads.

This great interest has spent thousands of dollars in prosecuting its complaints before the Interstate Commerce Commission and in trying to get relief from the oppression of the railroads. The complaints show advances in the rates for shipment of cattle to northwestern feeding grounds from $55 per car to $100 per car—advances on which the railroads have extorted not less than $3,000,000. They present the advances by the addition of a terminal charge of $2 per car for delivery at the Union Stock Yards at Chicago—an extortion amounting through the years to over $6,000,000. The complaints further show that the rates to markets have been advanced from 4¼ cents to 9½ cents per 100 pounds, or from 12 per cent to 31 per cent, and that the rates in force are higher than they have ever been in twenty years, or since the filing of tariffs and the establishment of the Interstate Commerce Commission give us a record upon which to base accurate statement of specific rate changes.

The cattlemen complained that all these rates are "unjust, unreasonable, and unlawful." They supported their complaints with comparisons of these rates with the maximum reasonable rates established by the State of Texas, and showed that the interstate rates for like services were 37 to 41 per cent in excess of the rates fixed in Texas.

Further, the cattlemen complained that these increases in the rates had been accompanied by marked deterioration in the service, causing great losses to the shippers.

When these complaints of the cattlemen were presented to the railway managers, they answered, with supreme assurance: "Oh, we expected them to complain." They did complain. The complaints have been prosecuted at great expense of time and labor. At great trouble and expense these complaints of "unjust, unreasonable, and unlawful" rates have been laid before Congress.

In February, 1903, an advance was ordered by the roads of 2 cents per 100 pounds, or $8 per car, in all rates on southern pine lumber from all southern producing points from Georgia to Texas, inclusive, to all markets north of the Ohio River, to all points in the Middle and Eastern States—to practically all outside markets to which the lumber is shipped. This advance 20,000,000 tons. On this traffic the total increased charge amounts to $8,000,000 annually, and if figured from the time the advance was made to the present time this advance amounts to not less than $25,000,000.

Not only is there complaint of this advance in the rates to northern markets, but in the lumber districts of the South there is the most vigorous complaint of the unreasonableness of the rates for the distribution of lumber locally. Comparison is made with the State rates of Texas to emphasize the necessity of a law to prevent unreasonable rates on interstate traffic, but this complaint, like that of the cattle raisers, will not be satisfied by simply giving them relatively equal rates. They are entitled to real justice, not merely relative justice.

These are only a few of the many advances in rates of which we find complaint in the hearings. The Interstate Commerce Commission reported advances of 10 cents per ton on soft coal and amounting on the traffic affected to $10,000,000 annually. Advances on iron and steel articles were estimated by the Commission to amount to $4,000,000 per year.

Mr. President, I shall next consider one of the defenses which the railroads make when charged with having greatly advanced their rates.

INCREASE IN TON-MILE REVENUE.

Notwithstanding that specific advances have in recent years been made in the rates on many important commodities, and general advances have been made through classifications, it is contended that the average freight revenue per ton-mile shows that rates have been reduced. Senators well understand that the per ton-mile rate means the average revenue from hauling a ton of freight 1 mile. This contention is suported with comparisons of the rates per ton per mile for various years, so selected as to support that claim. While it is true that the ton-mile rate shows a decrease from many years ago, since the year 1899, which marks the inauguration of the great period of combination and the elimination of competition, the ton-mile rate, even, shows a constant upward tendency year after year.

For these years the statistical reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission show the following average revenue per ton-mile:

	Cents.
1899	0.724
1901	.750
1902	.757

The increase, now, mark you, from year to year on each ton-mile is not large, but the aggregate increase when applied to the total traffic which it affects is enormous. The increase from 1899 to 1904 amounts to 0.56 of a mill per ton-mile. This increase, on the traffic of 1904 (175 billion ton-miles), equals a hundred million dollars. This is the amount the public paid in additional freight charges on the traffic of that year alone more than they would have paid had the rate of 1899 not been advanced.

But the increase in freight rates is only partly measured by the increase in the ton-mile revenue. The revenues are the product of the rates and the traffic. Both of these quantities are variable. The rates, as we have seen, have been advanced to increase the average revenue per ton per mile. The traffic, on the other hand, has undergone certain changes which tended to decrease the revenue per ton per mile. If there had been no advance in rates, the changes in traffic conditions would have lowered the per ton-mile revenue. Thus the tendency of traffic changes has been to offset and conceal the effect of the increases in rates on the revenue per ton per mile. The net result of these changes in the traffic conditions from earlier years to 1904 is that a ton-mile of traffic represents a less valuable service in 1904. In other words, the public in buying this unit amount of traffic in 1904 get less for the price paid. The principal traffic changes producing this effect are that the ton-mile of transportation service in 1904 represents, as compared with former years, (1) a greater proportion of low-grade, cheap traffic; (2) a greater proportion of long-haul traffic; (3) a greater proportion of carload (as against less than carload) traffic.

INCREASED TRAFFIC AND ECONOMY.

The foregoing enormous advances in rates have been made in the face of every known force in transportation conditions which tend naturally to reductions in rates. The density of traffic has increased enormously. The average length of haul has increased. The efficiency of road and equipment to handle traffic economically has been vastly increased. The public has every right to demand lower rates as the traffic increases and industrial development brings about greater efficiency and economy in the cost of performing transportation services. The common carrier is in any case entitled to only such profits as will yield a fair return on the fair value of the property employed.

How the rates have been advanced I have already shown. Now, I wish to present a few facts to show why the rates should have been reduced.

It is a fundamental principle in the laws of transportation cost that the average cost per ton per mile varies inversely with the number of ton-miles hauled. Or to state it more plainly, if less exactly, that the greater the amount of traffic hauled the less the cost of hauling each ton-mile. It does not cost twice as much to haul a carload of 20,000 pounds as to haul a carload of 10,000 pounds; it does not cost twice as much to haul a carload 100 miles as to haul it 50 miles. Based on this fact, every test applicable demands a lower cost, and therefore lower rates in 1904 than in 1897.

The most significant factor in determining the ton-mile cost is the average number of tons of freight hauled in each train. You can haul a train of thirty loaded cars 100 miles at very much less cost per car than you can haul a train of ten cars the same distance. That must be very apparent to everyone. Mr. Woodlock, in his book "The Anatomy of a Railroad Report," analyzing the cost per ton per mile, concludes that the train load is the supreme factor in the determination of ton-mile cost; that it is the test of economical railroading, and that it "determines a larger proportion of the ton-mile cost than all other factors put together."

The number of trains run directly affects about 60 per cent of all operating expenses. The larger the train load the fewer trains will be required to handle a given amount of traffic. Hence it may be said, roughly speaking, that 60 per cent of the average cost per ton-mile is reduced in direct proportion as the number of tons hauled in each train load is increased. There are other minor factors, such as tons per car, tons per locomotive, etc., which affect the ton-mile cost in a less degree, but when all such factors have a common tendency, the effect of each factor augments the force of all the factors in combination.

The statistical reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission show that the average numer of tons of freight carried per train load in 1897 was 204 tons, and in 1904, 307 tons, or an increase of 50 per cent, and representing the relative decrease in the cost of handling the traffic per ton per mile. In like manner, the average number of tons hauled per each freight car in operation increased 27 per cent, and per each locomotive 33 per cent.

Perhaps the force of these changes in traffic conditions as tending to reduce the cost per ton per mile will be more readily appreciated if stated conversely. Given 1,000,000 tons of freight to be moved in 1897 and 1904, the changes in traffic density and other conditions effect the following savings in the amount of equipment necessary and services required:

	1897.	1904.	Savings in 1904.
			Number.	Per cent.
Services.
Train loads	4,902	3,257	1,645	50.5
Train men	218	194	24	12.3
Equipment.
Cars required	1,647	1,292	355	27.5
Locomotives	27.5	20.6	6.9	33.2

Further consideration of freight traffic conditions only serve to emphasize the showing made by the above figures. The total number of tons of freight carried increased 76.6 per cent; the number of tons carried 1 mile—the total number of absolute units of traffic—the increase during the seven-year period, 83.4 per cent. The traffic density, i. e., the number of tons carried 1 mile per mile of line, shows the remarkable increase of 60 per cent, and in the face of all the conditions the best argument the roads have to offer in defense of the charges is the statement that their average revenue per ton-mile has been reduced from 7.98 mills in 1897 to 7.80 in 1904, a reduction of 0.18 mill, or 2.26 per cent.

In respect to passenger traffic it is sufficient to point out that the same tendencies, only slightly less in degree, are true, as in the case of freight traffic. As an offset to this, the average rate per passenger per mile shows a reduction of 0.8 of 1 per cent. The figures are given in detail in the following table:

INCREASED COST—WAGES.

It is claimed by railroad representatives that the economies effected by changes in traffic conditions have been in part offset by advances in the cost of materials and wages during the period covered. Advances in the cost of the materials can not be determined in the present state of public information as to railway expenditures.

My authority for that statement is the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in which they state that they have been unable to obtain from the railroad companies under the present law such information as to permit them to place before the public the exact conditions with respect to operating expenses.

The railway reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission purport to give the amounts expended for labor employed in railway operation, and from such reports it appears that the total amount paid as wages and salaries by railroads increased from $465,601,581 in 1897 to $817,598,810 in 1904, or about 75 per cent. Railroad representatives frequently cite this statement as going to show an enormous increase in the wages paid to railway employees, and without further explanation allowing it to be inferred that it represents a large increase in the rate of wages. The fact is that the increase in this total reported expenditure for wages and salaries is less than the proportion of increase in the total traffic handled, and the increase in the average wage per employee is less than the increase in the average traffic per employee.

If the total compensation and the number of employees reported for the two years, respectively, be a reliable basis for computation, the average yearly earning per employee in 1897 was $565.28, and in 1904 $630.80, or an increase of about 11.5 per cent. But, according to the reports, the increase for the same period in the average amount of traffic handled per employee is 12.2 per cent. Therefore any advance in the rate of wages paid was more than offset by the increased service per employee.

While it is true that a higher rate of increase is reported in the average daily wages for some classes of employees, in other classes the rate of increase is very much less than the above figure. Thus, in four classes, aggregating about 250,000 employees, the increase is less than 5 per cent, and on only a few classes does the increase exceed 15 per cent. It would appear, therefore, that the above computed average increase in yearly earnings substantially agrees with the increase in the daily wages as reported, and, further, that the increase in the rate of wages on either basis is not greater than the increase in the average traffic handled per employee.

From the foregoing consideration it is evident that the average rate of wages paid was not increased from 1897 to 1904 more than 12 per cent. Surely this is true if the increase in officers' salaries is not included. The apparent increase in the average amount of traffic handled per employee was 12 per cent; the real increase in the amount of traffic handled per employee was much greater than 12 per cent. This fact is made evident by the following considerations:

1. The average traffic per employee is computed by dividing the total traffic by the total number of employees.

2. If the number of employees reported be greater than the number actually employed in railway operation, this computed average traffic handled per employee will be proportionately understated.

3. The total number of employees reported for 1904 greatly exceeds the number actually employed in handling the traffic, because there are included in the number so reported thousands of employees engaged in the construction of betterments and additions to the property, but charged to operating expenses.

While there were probably some employees engaged in the construction of betterments charged to operating in 1897, the number was very small, as compared with 1904. It is chiefly in times of great prosperity that railway improvements are made out of earnings and charged to operating expenses. Later I shall give instances of millions of expenditures made in this manner in the last few years.

In addition to this well-known fact, there is evidence in the railway reports indicating a large increase in the numbers of employees engaged in improvements and charged to operating expenses.

Railway employees whose compensation is charged to operating expenses are classified, exclusive of general administrative employees, under the following departments: Maintenance of Way and Structures; Maintenance of Equipment; Conducting Transportation.

With the great increase in the volume of traffic, we should expect a considerable increase in the number of persons required in the conduct of transportation. There would also be an increase in the number of persons required to maintain the condition and efficiency of way and equipment, though these departments would be less directly affected by the increase in traffic than would the transportation department. On the other hand, employees engaged on improvements charged to operating expenses would naturally be reported in the maintenance department. If the number of employees improperly charged in this manner was large enough it might result in a greater increase in the number employed in the maintenance departments. This is precisely what the reports show.

The number of persons employed in conducting transportation increased as a consequence of increased traffic only 50 per cent. But the number of employees in maintenance departments increased 67 per cent, as a result not only of increased traffic, but on account of improvements and betterments made. Of course, this increase affects the increase in the total number of employees and results in an improper reduction in the average traffic per employee.

Assume that the increase in the number of employees properly chargeable to maintenance should be as great as the increase in conducting transportation—say 50 per cent. Then all over 50 per cent are improperly charged, and should be deducted. When figured out, this difference amounts to nearly 70,000 employees. And it is evident that at least this number of the employees charged as engaged in operating the railways are actually engaged on improvements and additions to the property.

If this correction and reduction be made in the number of employees reported, and a new computation made of the average traffic per employee, the result shows that the average traffic per employee, in 1904, instead of being 1,011 tons, was, at least 1,067 tons, or an increase over the average for 1897 of 18.4 per cent—an increase in the traffic handled per employee more than one-half greater than the increase in the rate of wages per employee. In the face of this fact it is idle for railway representatives to contend that the increases that have been made in wages in any degree justify the advances in freight charges. Whatever the amount of such increases in wages may have been, it is a perfectly safe conclusion that they have been entirely provided for by the increase in the traffic handled.

OVERCAPITALIZATION.

Mr. President, the railroad is entitled to "just compensation" for its public services.

Reasonable rates are held to be such rates as afford "just compensation."

The Supreme Court has determined that reasonable rates affording "just compensation" are such rates as pay a fair return on a fair value of railway property.

We shall settle nothing then, respecting reasonable rates and just compensation until we ascertain the fair value of the railroad property of the country.

The railroads are capitalized at $13,213,124,679 (1904).

The public believes that this capitalization grossly exceeds the fair value of the property; that it has been wrongfully "watered" and inflated; and that the producers and consumers of the country are unjustly taxed on transportation to pay an income upon a false and fradulent valuation. The railroads deny this claim. That makes a sharp and conflicting issue between the public and the railroads.

I shall, therefore, present in this connection evidence of the over capitalization, inflation, and "watering" of many of the railroad properties of the country. I shall go into the subject fully enough to impeach the standing capitalization of the railroad property of the country. I shall present such an array of facts as shall enforce the public demand for an accurate valuation of the railroad property of the country.

The falsity of any representation which speaks of railway capitalization as "railway investment" becomes readily apparent when a few instances are cited to show the nature and source of capitalization of some of our leading railroads. Only a few days ago the case of the Wilmington and Delton, a North Carolina railroad was cited here. This road was originally capitalized on such a basis that its stock afterwards sold at $40 per share. The earnings were forced up, however, and when the road became important it was merged into the Atlantic Coast Line and $400 of new stock issued for every $100 of the old stock, which had in past years been selling at $40 per share.

Probably everyone is familiar with the history of the making of millions of Erie stock by Daniel Drew, the treasurer of the road, to pay a gambling debt. He had sold short to Vanderbilt, who was trying to get entire control of the road, and when Drew found that Vanderbilt had cornered all the stock in sight he got a printing press and made enough more Erie stock to satisfy his obligation. And this generation is asked to fix transportation charges high enough to pay interest and dividends on railroad securities created in this manner.

An examination of financial newspaper files will show regularly, advertisements of reorganization committees announcing about as follows:

The reorganization committee will issue $1,000 of new 6 per cent bonds; $1,000 of 6 per cent preferred stock, and $1,000 of new common stock in exchange for each $1,000 of 6 per cent old bonds.

Some interesting evidence on this question was given before the Cullom committee in 1886. Mr. O'Donnell, of the New York State Railroad Commission, called attention to the watered capitalization of the Erie Railroad in the following language:

They increased their capital one year over $30,000,000, and the reason they gave was that they had to lay down steel rails. In the vernacular of the newspapers at that time they spelled steel rails "s-t-e-a-l."

Mr. H. V. Poor, the author of "Poor's Manual" of railroads, in his statement before the Cullom committee, 1886, pointed out that the most of this fictitious capitalization has been issued in defiance of law and in violation of charter provisions. He says, in part:

The reasons for such provisions are obvious. Railroads have virtually the power of taxing the people. * * * The object of such provisions is to limit this power of taxation to a fair return on the capital actually invested. The common way in which such a wholesome provision of the law is avoided is by contracts for construction in which the promoters of the railroad to be built are really the contractors, receiving a gross amount of stocks and bonds, twice or thrice greater, perhaps, than the cash cost of the road.

As illustrations of such fictitious capitalization Mr. Poor cited the Pacific roads chartered by Congress. In the act chartering the several companies it was provided that the share capital should be subscribed for bona fide, and that the full nominal value of the same should be paid in in cash.

A Congressional investigation of the Union Pacific showed that the stock of the company was issued chiefly to the directors of the road under a contract for construction without consideration. The committee reported to the House that the issue of this stock in violation of law justified the abrogation of the company's charter. It was not abrogated.

The Northern Pacific Company, under like charter restrictions, divided the whole nominal amount of $100,000,000 of its capital stock among the promoters of the enterprise, little or nothing being paid thereon, before any considerable expenditure was made on the road.

The Central Pacific was likewise constructed by its promoters, and the greater part of the stock issued went to them as a gratuity.

The water in the Erie was described by Mr. Poor as the difference between the par value of $55,000,000 of bonds ($1,000 each) and the price, $350 each, at which they were sold, or in all about $36,000,000.

The New York Central secured a special act of the New York legislature which allowed some $48,000,000 of water to be added to the capitalization of that property, in violation of statutory and charter provisions. The promoters of the New York, West Shore and Buffalo Railroad divided the $40,000,000 capital stock of that company as a part merely of their profits to be received under a construction contract.

The greater part of the share capital, $50,000,000, of the New York, Chicago and St. Louis Railroad was issued in like manner as a profit to the promoters.

Says Mr. Poor:

Another mode of issuing "water" was that adopted by the East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia Company, which, without the payment of any considerable sum into the treasury, increased its share capital from $1,900,000 to $44,000,000, the occasion of the increase being the purchase of or consolidation with some other line.

Previously, in his Manual for 1884, Mr. Poor had given careful attention to this question, and as a result of his investigations stated that the true investment in our railroads did not exceed the amount of the bonded indebtedness. In a subsequent estimate, before the Cullom committee, Mr. Poor somewhat reduced the proportion of the fictitious capitalization in the foregoing statement, but he was particular to state that in this later estimate no allowance was made for the enormous amount of water in the bonds.

In the course of his statement Mr. Poor quoted Mr. Charles Francis Adams, writing in 1869 of the capitalization of the Union Pacific Railroad. The statement is all the more interesting in that Mr. Adams later, and at the time of Mr. Poor's statement, was president of the road. Mr. Adams said:

The line from Chicago to New York represents now but $60,000 to the mile, as the result of many years of inflation, while the line between Omaha and San Francisco begins life with a cost of $115,000 per mile. It would be safe to say that this road cost considerably less than one-half of this sum. The difference is the price paid for every vicious element of railroad construction and management. Costly construction, entailing future taxation on freight; tens of millions of fictitious capital; a road built on the sale of its bonds and with the aid of subsidies; every element of real outlay recklessly exaggerated, and the whole of it some future day to make itself felt as a burden on the trade which it is to create.

By exacting earnings from the public on the basis of this fictitious capitalization, Mr. Poor says:

The Union Pacific and the Central Pacific together divided or carried to the credit of profit and loss over $100,000,000 over and above a fair return upon the capital invested in them. The water in the New York Central equaled $48,000,000 or thereabouts. Upon this sum dividends at the rate of 8 per cent were paid for fifteen years, the water and the dividends on the same equaling over $100,000,000.

Mr. Thurber, a New York wholesaler, who testified before the Cullom committee, criticised Mr. Poor's estimate of railroad fictitious capital in this language:

I know there are so many instances where that is so very much short of the mark that it is absurd. I think he said the New York Central was about half water. Why, the New York Central had been watered three times prior to 1867–68, and at that time they doubled it. They put forty-seven millions of water into the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad in 1867–68, and they paid 8 per cent dividends on that forty-seven millions until last year (1885). I think last year they paid 6 per cent.

Mr. Thurber submitted as an example of "how excessive capitalization operates as a mortgage upon the industry of the country" a computation of the amount of these dividends, with interest, over the period of fifteen years, which aggregated over $100,000,000.

In the statement of Mr. Simon Sterne, who testified before the Cullom committee as the representative of the Board of Trade and Transportation of New York, we obtain some interesting information as to the manner in which these stock issues and some other questionable items find their way into the construction accounts of the railways.

I shall presently show how the whole system of railway accounting has been built up with a view of concealing these transactions and of concealing the earnings of the railways from year to year up to the present time. Sir, I should not care to trespass upon the time of the Senate to present the facts of the false and fraudulent capitalization of the railroads of these earlier years, except that the villainous system still survives. The methods of Gould, and Fiske, and Vanderbilt, and Huntington are the methods of Morgan, and Rockefeller, and Hill, and Harriman. It is the same old game. The stakes are bigger now. The system of accounts and the other details are much more adroit and clever.

As an example, Mr. Sterne cites the expenditure one year by the Erie of $700,000 as a corruption fund and for legal expenses, which was carried to the "india-rubber account" and charged to the cost of construction. After the capital of the New York Central was doubled in 1869 they had a stock account, "which," says Mr. Sterne, "was out of all harmony with their construction account, and, for ten years following, every year varying, from 3 to 8 per cent of this water was artificially carried into the construction account, and the capital account balanced. * * * In the same way the balances were forced in the Erie Railway Company when Mr. Gould took $40,000,000 of stock of the Erie Railway Company, out of its books, and sold it on the street, and appropriated the money to his own use, and there was not a dollar's worth of construction to represent it; and when reorganization took place the balance of the Erie Railway Company was forced to meet that violence done to the stock account."

Is it to be supposed that the people of this country will consent to be taxed to the end of time upon capitalization of that sort?

In the final report of the Industrial Commission, is cited the purchase of the Chicago and Alton Railway, in 1899. The road had been capitalized at $30,000,000. The purchasing syndicate issued in the purchase a total capitalization of $94,000,000.

Another case cited is that of the St. Paul and Manitoba Company (Great Northern Company, Lessor). The property of this company had previously been bought at foreclosure at $3,600,000, and some years later the capitalization reached $84,550,000. In the Great Northern rate case of the Minnesota commission, the Minnesota court made an appraisal of this property to determine the reasonableness of rates, and held that the cost of reproduction of all property of the company at that time, 1896, could not exceed $44,000,000.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, in its decision in the Danville case, said of the $120,000,000 of common stock of the Southern Railway:

This common stock was issued as a part of a reorganization scheme, under which the Southern Railway Company came into existence. It does not appear that the persons to whom this stock was originally issued ever paid one dollar in actual value for it. It simply appears that the stock is outstanding.

In like manner, the capital of the Atlantic Coast Line was increased $50,000,000 without any additional investment, merely to enable Mr. Morgan to get the control of the Louisville and Nashville from Mr. Gates, whom he considered not a "proper person" to control the destinies of that road.

Mr. James J. Hill testified, in an investigation of the Northern Securities merger by the Interstate Commerce Commission, that in the purchase of $108,000,000 of Burlington stock by the Great Northern and Northern Pacific Companies, $216,000,000 new 4 per cent bonds were issued and that the purchasing companies which guaranteed the interest on these bonds, intended to make the property earn not only enough to pay 4 per cent on this doubled capitalization, but a dividend on the old stock as well. Mr. Hill further testified that in the merger there were issued on the capital of the Northern Pacific $22,500,000, and on that of the Great Northern $39,500,000, or a total of $62,000,000 of securities in excess of the old capital.

In the recapitalization of the Rock Island $75,000,000 Rock Island stock was converted into $75,000,000 of bonds and $137,000,000 new stock.

Current financial journals are discussing a proposed new issue of one hundred million dollars of New York Central stock.

The Senator from South Carolina presented here a few days ago a letter from a competent engineer estimating the cost of railway construction. As a basis for this estimate, the railroads of Massachusetts were selected, because of the more efficient railway regulation of that State, and because the conditions there require relatively large investment for equipment.

After making most liberal allowances for equipment and architectural work, and adding to the average standard costs of construction, the engineer arrived at an average cost per mile of $25,200, which, he said: "I have no doubt substantially exceeds the true costs of railways." On the same mileage the roads of the State are capitalized at $52,000 per mile—"51½ per cent water, probably more."

The writer gives as his conclusion, after thirty-four years of experience and investigation, "that, outside of Massachusetts," * * * "the equipment rarely costs as much as $5,000 per mile, and we are liberal in putting the cash cost of construction and equipment of all roads at an average of $20,000 per mile," making about five billion six hundred million dollars for the investment in all the roads of the country, in 1903, and leaving the seven billion additional capital to represent water. Every example of extraordinary cost of construction that may be cited is more than offset by hundreds of miles of railway which have been built at a cost much less than $17,500 per mile.

To quote directly from the language of Engineer Marks on the cost of construction—

> You may, and probably will, have many instances of extraordinary cost of construction brought to prove to you the higher cost of our railways. Many of these instances are both unwise and unnecessary expenditures. Do not forget that for every such case there are hundreds of miles of railway which honestly have not cost $17,500 per mile to construct and equip; on the contrary, very much less.

The most comprehensive statement of the fictitious capitalization of the American railroads, and the most extensive investigation of this question of "water," are probably embodied in the work of Mr. Van Oss, of London, entitled, "American Railroads as Investments," published in 1893. While the information here presented is for the benefit of investors primarily, the facts are equally valuable for our purpose. The conclusions are all the more reliable in consideration of the fact that they are offered largely in commendation of our railway securities as investments, and are not open to such criticism of radicalism as are usually made, by railway interests, in answer to statements of this kind. I wish to say that Mr. Van Oss is an investment banker of London. He is late editor of the Investor's Chronicle. He published, in 1892, "American Railroads as Investments;" in 1893, "American Railways and British Investors;" in 1896, "A Decade of Finance." He has written and still writes articles for various leading reviews on the subject of finance and investments. The added fact that Mr. Van Oss's work is used extensively in the Final Report of the Industrial Commission, gives it a certain authoritative standing, and warrants the extended consideration which I wish to give certain statements and conclusions and the adoption of its final results as the basis for computing an estimate of the actual investment represented by present railway capital.

Mr. Van Oss classifies the different ways of inflating capital of American railways as follows:

1. By fraudulent issues of bonds and shares as a downright swindle or for speculative purposes.
2. By paying too much for construction.
3. By purchasing property at excessive prices.
4. By buying superfluous competing lines.
5. By selling bonds and shares at a discount.
6. By declaring stock dividends.

As an example of stock issued for speculative purposes the history of the Erie Railroad is cited. The capital of this road was increased between 1868 and 1872 "from $17,000,000 to $78,000,000, mainly to manipulate Wall Street." And President Watson, "a few years later, doubled the funded debt, it is said, also chiefly for his own benefit."

As an illustration of the construction company frauds, the incident of the South Pennsylvania Railroad is given. This road was started by Vanderbilt to compete with the Pennsylvania, and it was, says Mr. Van Oss, > proven to have cost actually $6,500,000, and a responsible contractor had offered to build it at that price. Yet a construction company, composed of Vanderbilt's clerks, received $15,000,000 to complete it, and the syndicate of capitalists which supplied this money got $40,000,000 in bonds and shares, so that for every dollar of actual cost over $6 of bonds and shares were issued.

In the same manner, though not in the same proportion, the thing was worked all over the Union. * * * The builders of the Central Pacific, for instance, commenced with the modest sum of $159,000, and, taking this as a nucleus, they completed the road, gathering a capitalization of $139,000,000. * * * The Government commission on Pacific Railroads in its report to Congress says that $58,000,000 would have been a very good price for the railway.

Of the extent to which was carried the practice of selling to railway companies property of officers and directors at excessive prices, in stocks and bonds, Mr. Van Oss says:

> Until twelve or fifteen years ago the majority of purchases of auxiliary concerns used to be permeated with fraud.

Parallel lines of railway were built to force their purchase at excessive prices, as a sort of blackmail, backed by the threat of competition. Such purchases added great amounts to the capitalization, but little or nothing to the earning power of the properties. Thus Vanderbilt was forced to lease the West Shore and buy the Nickle Plate, and the Pennsylvania, in turn, had to come to Vanderbilt's terms to preserve its monopoly from competition of the South Pennsylvania.

To secure capital it was a common practice to allow liberal discounts on bonds, "and shares were frequently given into the bargain. * * * The railroads would have outgrown the payments of excessive rates for money if their affairs had otherwise been conducted with honesty and integrity." But they were not. Hence, "shares not being much sought after, it mattered little to the promoter whether he gave shares into the bargain or not." The majority of companies realized nothing for the shares they issued in their early days. The Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railway Company, for instance, gave $21,400,000 in shares to a construction company, in addition to the payment made in bonds. The New York Central, Erie, Reading, St. Paul, Chicago and Northwestern—in short, almost every railway company received nothing for the earlier issue of its ordinary shares. * * * Instances are given of fictitious capital resulting from the payment of stock dividends, as follows:

In December, 1868, the New York Central distributed a stock dividend of 80 per cent, and eleven months later, when consolidation with the Hudson River Railroad followed, a further stock dividend of 27 per cent was declared, while the Hudson River shareholders received one of 85 per cent.

The Reading paid a script dividend of 10 per cent in 1846, one of 12 per cent in 1847, while between 1871 and 1876, upon a capital of $32,200,000, more than half water, $15,700,000 was paid in dividends, mostly scrip.

The Erie made still larger payments of stock dividends; the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy in 1888 paid 20 per cent, and the Santa Fe in 1881 paid 50 per cent.

The practice—

> may be said to have been general, and is still resorted to in numerous cases.

The aggregate amount of water in the five hundred million capitalization of the Central, Erie, and Reading companies is variously estimated from $200,000,000 to $300,000,000.

Poor's Manual for 1884 points out that the increase of capitalization of American railways for the three years ending December 30, 1883, was $2,093,000,000, or $70,000 per each mile of new road. Mr. Poor said:

> The cost of the mileage construction certainly did not exceed $30,000 per mile. The whole increase of the share capital and a portion of the funded debt was in excess of the cost of construction.

Referring to this statement of Mr. Poor, Mr. Van Oss says:

> Some writers even go so far as to allege that the estimate of Mr. Poor, whom they deem a spokesman of the railways, is moderate and conservative, and the fictitious capital is said by some, among others by Mr. Hudson, to amount perhaps to fully two-thirds of the total capitalization.

Some sound reasons are given by Mr. Van Oss why this view is not improbable.

As a result of his investigation of American railway history and capitalization, Mr. Van Oss arrives at two important conclusions: First, that the average amount originally received in actual value for American railway bonds probably did not exceed 67 per cent. Second, that the original investor in American railway stocks certainly paid not more, on the average, than 10 per cent of their face value, and probably less.

If an estimate of the actual investment on American railroads is computed on the basis of these final percentages given by Mr. Van Oss on the capitalization of 1904 as reported by the Interstate Commerce Commission, we get the following result:

Stock, 10 per cent of $6,339,899,329	$633,989,932
Bonds, 67 per cent of $6,873,225,350	4,605,060,984
Total investment represented by $13,213,124,679, total capital	5,239,050,916
or, in round numbers	5,000,000,000

The remaining $8,000,000,000 odd are entirely fictitious capitalization, and can not be considered in discussion of railway earnings. This gross estimate of cost equals $23,500 per mile of line and exceeds the average true value per mile of all the railroads of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Texas, as actually determined, and is substantially as high as the value placed on the roads of Massachusetts in the engineer's estimates before quoted.

Now, Mr. President, if I am not overtaxing the patience of Senators, I wish to call attention to the methods by which these great and excessive earnings are concealed by the railroad companies of the country.

BETTERMENTS AND SURPLUS OUT OF PROFITS.

To understand the inadequacy of any dividend statement as an index to railway profits, it is only necessary to give attention to a few simple elementary facts. The railroads themselves report annually millions of net earnings in excess of the amounts distributed to bond and stock holders. Enormous sums are every year carried to surplus and devoted to additions, betterments, and improvements out of profits. A tabulation, showing such expenditures for additions to property out of profits, as stated in recent reports of some thirty-two of our leading railways, is hereto appended. [Appendix B.]

I need not pause to say that it is wholly wrong to tax transportation of the people of this country high enough to enable the railroad companies to pile up a great surplus and to make out of their profits improvements and investments for which they should provide with new capital. In other words, they make the public furnish the new capital, and then make them pay interest and dividends upon it. Among the roads included, the Baltimore and Ohio, from 1899 to 1905, spent out of profits over $19,000,000 for improvements; the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western, 1901–1904, over $13,000,000; the Erie, 1902–1905, over $5,000,000; the New York Central, 1899–1904, over $9,000,000; the Pennsylvania, 1899–1904, over $50,000,000; the Chicago and Northwestern Railway, 1900–1905, over $26,000,000; the St. Paul, 1900–1905, nearly $10,000,000; the Omaha, 1899–1905, over $16,000,000; the Santa Fe, 1896–1904, $30,000,000; the Great Northern, 1898–1905, nearly $16,000,000; the Northern Pacific, 1899–1905, about $20,000,000, and the Union Pacific, 1900–1905, over $13,000,000.

Every one of these cases represents excessive taxation of transportation, which, under the Supreme Court decisions, is unlawful. The railroad companies of the country have a right to tax transportation—and I remind the Senate of it again—only enough to pay operating expenses and give them a fair interest or return on the fair value of their property. This is the limit of their lawful profits, and again I remind the Senate that they take out of the people, the producers and consumers of this country, besides their legitimate profits, enough additional and unlawful profits to enable them to accumulate a great surplus. Out of this surplus they make extensive improvements and investments, for which they should pay their own money. Then they "capitalize" these investments and improvements so wrongfully accumulated out of the profits on excessive rates, and, in turn, make this the basis for charging still higher rates. How much longer is the public to wait for Congress to act, while this process of capitalizing extortionate rates goes on? Is it to be expected that the country will patiently accept a bill that does not pretend to touch the source of this infamous wrong?

It is true that these enormous profits do not go to the owners of railway securities directly as interest or dividends, but usually it is the practice of railway companies to capitalize these improvements, and to favor the stockholders in the distribution of the new stock. These improvements add to the earning power of the roads. No further justification is offered by railway magnates for the issue of new capital than that the traffic and the earning power—that is, the traffic and the rates chargeable—can be made to pay interest and dividends on such capital. This was the justification offered by Mr. Hill for the $216,000,000 new railway capital issued in the so-called "purchase" of the Burlington by the Great Northern and Northern Pacific companies. Nothing is omitted to be done in the interest of railway promoters for the want of a pretext. An example is the case of the Chicago and Northwestern road. This road for several years has been making extensive improvements out of profits. From 1900 to 1905, inclusive, it has made such improvements to the amount of $26,500,000. In 1903, $36,000,000 of common stock was issued to buy the "franchises," etc., of the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railroad Company, of which company the Northwestern already owned all the stock; in other words, the complete title to the road, franchises, and all, excepting such mortgages as were a lien on the property.

When such stock is sold to stockholders of the company issuing it, usually it is sold at about half its value in the market. The favored purchasers may then turn around and sell it to "investors" at the market price. The investors, in turn, expect the value of the new stock to be maintained by the payment of dividends to be earned by charging the public as much as the traffic will bear.

The relation between return on railway securities and the rates charged is very clearly set forth in the London Statist. In an article in June, 1904, urging advantages of American railway securities, the following language is used:

> In recent years there have been few new railroads constructed, and the density of traffic has grown very rapidly. Hence rates have been restored (i. e., to the basis enforced preceding the competitive period of previous years) and with but unimportant exceptions have been firmly maintained. These conditions, moreover, appear likely to be permanent.

TRUE RAILROAD PROFITS NOT KNOWN.

It is a common practice with our railroads in their financial reports, by improper charges to operating expenses, to grossly understate their net earning. Nowhere is there any public information that will furnish a basis for a true determination of the true profits of railroads. Respecting this situation, the Interstate Commerce Commission, in its report for 1903, has the following statement:

> In order to determine whether railroad charges are reasonable or unreasonable, it is necessary to know what measure of profit the carrier is deriving from the rate imposed and what amount of money is received and in what way it is expended. It makes a wide difference whether the revenues of the carrier are used up in necessary cost of operation or are employed in adding to the permanent value of its property.

Of the reports furnished by the carriers, the Commission adds:

> If carriers do not make report or fail to make full report no penalty is provided. As a result certain railways have habitually refused to state what permanent improvements are charged to operating expenses. Others, while professing to distinguish, evidently do not. The result is that the net earnings given in our statistical report do not show the actual net earnings of our railways as a whole, and this is especially so of the last few years, during which most improvements have been made.

This criticism is true generally of all figures and reports furnished by the railroads.

Notwithstanding all the economies resulting from changes in traffic conditions, the ratio of operating expenses to gross earnings has been maintained in the reports. In 1897 the operating ratio stood at 67.06 per cent, and in 1904 at 67.79. The manner in which this is accomplished is indicated in the notations to Mr. Floyd W. Mundy's Investor's Manual for 1906, "The Earning Power of Railroads." In these notes you will read of the Delaware and Hudson: "For years a large amount" expended for improvements has been charged to operating expenses; of the Northern Central Railway Company that: "Operating expenses have for years been liberally charged for betterments;" of the Pennsylvania that: "Operating expenses have for years been heavily charged for improvements;" of the Southern Pacific that from 1905 operating expenses were charged with the cost of renewing with heavy steel rails twenty-seven hundred miles of line; and you will read that the Michigan Central "has for years adjusted its expenses to its earnings," i. e., charged betterments to operating expenses to whatever amount was necessary to maintain a constant operating ratio.

Sometimes partial statements of such improper charges to operating expenses are given in footnotes in reports to stockholders. Financial writers, who make a study of these matters upon careful analysis of such reports, are able to estimate partly the amount of such charges. In Mr. Mundy's manual, "The Earning Power of Railways," for 1906 are given in notes at the back of the book such statements for a number of companies. Some of these instances are set down in the following table:

Table showing instances of expenditures for improvements and additions to property charged to operating expenses.

In England the practice of charging betterments to operating expenses, which prevails here, is unknown. English financial writers find it necessary for the information of foreign investors to correct the reported net earnings of the American railways by the addition thereto of the amount of such improper charge against operating. In analyzing the profits of a few of our leading railways, the London Statist, in 1904, had a tabulation showing net earnings corrected in this manner. Such corrections made in the reported net earnings of nine roads for the year 1903 amounted to $21,263,000 on a total reported net earning of $135,367,000. The correction on these nine roads taken together amounted to 16 per cent of the total net earnings reported. The details are set forth in the following table:

London Statist corrections of reported net earnings of nine American railways for the fiscal year 1903.

PRESENT RAILWAY PROFITS GROSSLY EXCESSIVE.

It becomes desirable in this discussion to estimate, as best we may, in some measure the amount to which railway charges are, on the whole, excessive. If railway interests have any complaint to make against any such estimates as are offered, it should be remembered that it is the railways themselves who, by their practice of manipulating railway accounts and statistics and by their issues of billions of watered capital, make it necessary that this discussion proceed upon the unsatisfactory basis of mere general estimates instead of exact knowledge which the public has a right to have. These are public-service corporations. If it be true that the public should pay transportation charges to yield a fair profit on a fair value, then the public is entitled to know not only the value of railway property, but the exact cost of operation and every other fact pertaining to the conduct of the business which in every way bears upon the cost or the character of the service.

Transportation and transportation charges affect the daily life of every man who must support a family in this country. The head of the household is the freight payer in the United States. From the time he begins to have any responsibility in the maintenance of a family he must pay freight on every single article that enters into the economy of the household or the material life of the family.

I do not expect that an estimate of the actual investment in railways, as computed on the basis of Mr. Van Oss's investigations will pass without criticism. But the comprehensive and thorough character of the investigations certainly entitle his conclusions to respectful consideration. I believe that they are fair and conservative. In any computation of reasonable railway profits, based upon this estimated value, it should be kept in mind that no deduction is made for that part of the value of our railway which was donated by the public.

Mr. President, when so much sympathy is expressed for "innocent purchasers" of watered stocks and bonds, I think it is worth while for the Senate, for the Congress, and for the country to consider the vast amounts of money that have been given by private donation, by State appropriation through municipal bonds, by State donation through land grants, and by lavish donations through land grants made by the Federal Government. These enormous contributions by the innocent public add another argument demanding that the interests of the general public shall be the first and paramount consideration in this legislation.

The total amount of such donations is variously estimated as high as $2,000,000,000. Furthermore, any computation of railway profits must, for want of better information, accept as a basis of railway profits the net earnings as reported by the company. Such net earnings are very much understated, probably to the extent of 15 per cent of the total net earnings reported.

If there is a disposition to contend that railway capital issued subsequent to Mr. Van Oss's report represents a larger proportion of actual investment than determined by him at that time, I ask that the above facts be given consideration. It is not admitted that later issues of capital represent more real investment; but if this be so, the error in our conclusions which this may tend to produce will be fully offset by the inclusion of the enormous amounts of railway value which have been literally given by the public, and the acceptance of the understated net earnings of the railways as a basis of computing their profits. Finally, I wish to call attention to the fact that an estimate of $5,000,000,000 as the actual value of American railways is equal to $23,500 per mile on the mileage of 1904. This is more than the average value per mile for all the roads, the value of which has been actually determined by the States of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Texas. With a knowledge of the roads of Michigan and Wisconsin, I do not hesitate to say that they fairly represent the average cost of the roads of the country.

The total net earnings of the railways of this country as reported for 1904 amounted to $685,205,467. This net earning equals an annual return of 13.7 per cent on a total investment of $5,000,000,000. Money is seeking investment to-day where the security is adequate for a return of 4 per cent and even less. I believe that under an efficient Government control there would be no place where honest investment would be more secure than in the railroad development of this country.

If 4 per cent is a fair rate of earning, the railroads of this country are charging annually at least $485,000,000 more for transportation than is a fair return upon their investment and a just compensation for the services rendered. This amount is nearly 25 per cent of their total gross charges. It amounts to $6.06 per capita for every inhabitant of the country, or $38.50 for each family.

If 5 per cent is a fair rate, the roads are charging annually at least $435,000,000 more than is fair and reasonable, or an amount equal to 22.7 per cent of their total gross charges—$5.43 per capita, or over $25 per family.

If 6 per cent is a fair rate, the carriers are exacting annually at least $385,000,000 more than is fairly reasonable, or nearly 20 per cent of their total gross charges. In other words, on this rate of profit the gross charges are practically 25 per cent in excess of just and reasonable charges. This excess amounts to $4.81 per capita, and $22.60 for each head of the family.

If the carriers are entitled to earn 8 per cent, they are now overcharging by at least $285,000,000 annually. This is an annual tax upon the people over and above any possible fair or reasonable charge for the service rendered amounting to over $3.65 per capita, or about $17 for every head of a family in the United States.

These rough estimates are not submitted as final statements, but are subject to revision in the light of additional information, but no hesitancy is felt in expressing confidence that an exact knowledge of the facts involved will require a revision of these estimates to show a larger measure of extortion than is here suggested. It is not the purpose of these figures to present a measure of this extortion so much as to make clear the conditions which demand that a true and actual measure of such extortion shall be determined, and finally to demand that power be lodged in some competent and disinterested tribunal to correct it.

PUBLIC AID TO RAILWAY CONSTRUCTION.

We sometimes hear it stated that the cost of reproduction of railway property would not fully and fairly represent the actual investment. On the contrary, present values, as represented by the cost of reproduction, or almost any other measure by which the roads may be valued, would be more, by hundreds of millions of dollars, than the actual investment in the property on which the stocks and bonds were based. A large part (estimated as high as two billions of dollars) of the actual investment, which was about five billions, was not furnished by the owners of the railroads, but was furnished by the public. These donations were in the form of enormous land grants, of State and Federal subsidies of cash and credit, rights of way, cash bonuses by towns and counties, and subscriptions to the capital stock.

Frequently we hear it urged that railroad owners should be allowed a profit on more than the actual investment, because of the risk which they assume in constructing the road. The contention is unsound, because in the majority of cases, the railroad builders did not assume this risk. In recent railway construction there is practically no considerable risk. In the earlier period of construction, and to a less degree in the later, substantially all the risk involved was assumed by the community in which the roads are built.

The amount of land granted by State and Federal governments in the aid of railways is expressed only by figures so large as to be totally incomprehensible. In twenty years prior to 1871 the Federal Government granted in aid of railway construction 155,000,000 acres of land. Several States granted, in addition to this amount, a sum sufficient to equal about 200,000,000 acres of land. While a considerable amount of the Federal grants were forfeited, the railways have received from this source about 100,000,000 acres, and will receive many millions more. The amount actually received from the State and National governments will aggregate an area equal to five States the size of Pennsylvania.

In addition to these enormous land grants many millions of dollars in national and State bonds were issued in the aid of railway construction. The United States Government issued to the Pacific road Federal bonds to the amount of $16,000 a mile to the base of the Rocky Mountains and $48,000 to $32,000 per mile through the mountains to the Pacific coast. This loan was secured to the Government by a second mortgage on the road, which was subject to a prior mortgage for a like amount per mile. In this manner the Federal Government loaned to the Union Pacific, the Central Pacific, the Western Pacific, the Kansas Pacific, and two smaller companies about $65,000,000. This does not include the interest on the bonds, which for years was paid by the Government, and which was never fully repaid.

Several of the States made grants of many millions of dollars in similar manner. The State of Missouri spent thirty-two millions, of which it never recovered but six. Tennessee spent thirty millions. Half of the States in the construction period increased their bonded debts for the aid of railways. Among the larger contributors were Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Georgia, Tennessee, North Carolina, South Carolina, Missouri, Virginia, and Louisiana.

Counties and municipalities issued their bonds in like manner. The census of 1870 shows that there were still outstanding in county bonds issued in the aid of railway construction not less than $185,000,000. In New York State alone county and municipal aid amounted in 1870 to no less than thirty millions. And in Illinois, in 1873, it was determined that there had been spent $20,000,000 in this manner. This practice was common throughout the country.

As a general rule, the programme in railway construction was for the community to assume the first and greatest risk. In his History of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company, John W. Cary, for thirty years general counsel of that company, says of the projectors of the first line of that great system:

> There were many active, energetic men ready to engage in the work, but without money.

When these "active, energetic men" had secured a charter; when they had secured Federal, State, or municipal aid; when the terminal city had loaned the company its credit in city bonds; when right of way and depot grounds had been donated to the company; when the towns along the right of way had put up bonuses; when the farmers had made subscriptions to the capital stock; when the success of the venture was practically assured, and sufficient security in the form of property and privileges was gathered in the company, then these "active, energetic men" could go to the financial centers and sell the mortgage bonds of the company. These bonds furnished enough additional money to build the road—and usually many snug fortunes besides, which on one pretext and another found their way into the pockets of promoters, together with a goodly number of bonds. As a regular part of the high-finance methods of railway construction, most of these construction companies went through foreclosure proceedings, and farmers and towns subscribing to stock and municipalities that had made loans on inferior mortgages found their securities worthless.

As an example of these practices I offer a few instances, taken from Mr. Cary's History of the St. Paul Company. These instances all relate to lines now within one company and lying within a small district in the southeastern part of the State of Wisconsin. The same territory is served by two other roads with similar histories. And the conditions represented were typical, not only for the entire system of these companies, but generally for all railway construction in the country down to very recent years. It still continues to some extent.

About the first step taken toward the construction of the Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad, the first line of the St. Paul system, was to induce the city of Milwaukee to issue bonds.

The Milwaukee and Fond du Lac Company began business by securing the loan of the city's (Milwaukee) credit of $114,000, secured to the city by a second mortgage on the proposed line, to be subject to a prior mortgage of $10,000 per mile.

The above company was consolidated with the Milwaukee, Fond du Lac and Green Bay Railroad. The city of Milwaukee loaned this company $200,000.

When the Fond du Lac and Green Bay Company had secured its loan of Milwaukee city bonds and depot grounds, it in turn consolidated with the La Crosse and Milwaukee Railroad Company.

The Milwaukee and Watertown Railroad Company secured similar aid from the city in the amount of $200,000.

The Milwaukee and Horicon Railway Company in like manner secured $166,000.

The Milwaukee and Mississippi Railway Company in 1867 began the extension of its line west of Janesville. The funds consisted of cash subscriptions to the stock, farm mortgages, and Milwaukee city bonds. Of these bonds there were issued for this company $300,000 on a second mortgage, and $250,000 for which the city received only common stock. On the subsequent foreclosure only $96,000 was received for the benefit of all stockholders.

In 1852 the Racine, Janesville and Mississippi Railroad Company was organized, and started to raise money to build from Racine to Janesville. Racine city issued bonds and subscribed to the capital stock to the amount of $300,000. Janesville failed to subscribe, so the charter was amended and the line changed to go through Beloit, and Beloit issued bonds and subscribed for $100,000 of stock. The town of Delavan subscribed for $25,000; the town of Racine for $50,000. As laid out, the line proposed to omit the towns of Burlington and Elkhorn, but upon their subscription to the stock they were included. The little town of Elkhorn paid $15,000 for the privilege of seeing the cars go by.

Mr. Cary says:

> The farmers along the line of road subscribed to the capital stock to quite an amount, and gave in payment of their subscriptions their notes secured by mortgages on their farms.

As, on subsequent foreclosure sales, the amount realized was less than the aggregate of the several mortgages the stockholders necessarily lost.

On its line constructed from Milwaukee to Portage, 96 miles, the La Crosse and Milwaukee Railroad Company raised $1,100,000, or more than $11,000 per mile in farm mortgages alone. The method by which these farm-mortgage subscriptions were raised is described by Mr. Cary as follows:

> The Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad had adopted the plan of raising funds by procuring farmers to subscribe to the capital stock of the company, and mortgaging their farms as security for their notes given for such subscriptions, and a considerable amount had, prior to the construction of the La Crosse road been realized in that manner on the Mississippi Railroad.
> This mode of procedure became quite common with several of the roads of Wisconsin, and it was adopted, among others, by the La Crosse company, and prosecuted most vigorously and successfully so far as obtaining mortgages from the farmers was concerned.
> Deacon Clinton, who had been engaged on that branch of business on the Mississippi road, was employed as a special director of the La Crosse road, and devoted his entire time to the matter of procuring subscriptions from the farmers on this plan.
> Such mortgages were procured to some extent in Washington County, very largely in Dodge County, and in Columbia and other counties along the line of the road.
> In all, over $1,100,000 of this class of subscriptions were obtained for the La Crosse company.
> The modus operandi was for the farmer to subscribe to the stock, give his note for the amount of the subscription, payable to the order of the company, secured by a mortgage on his farm, bearing from 8 to 10 per cent interest. The company then attached to said note and mortgage its bond guaranteeing the payment of the note and mortgage, principal and interest, and in and by the terms of the bond the note and mortgage were assigned to the holder, and such note, mortgage, and bond were sold in the market together as one security, and not separately, the note not indorsed. An agreement was also given to the farmer by which the company agreed to pay the interest on the note until it became due, in consideration of which the farmer made an assignment of his prospective dividends on the stock so subscribed for sufficient to pay said interest.
> It is needless to say that this stock proved worthless and that the farmers were compelled to pay their mortgages, and in very many cases lost their farms.

CONCLUSION.

Sir, this extended review of the evidence of increasing rates and vicious discrimination, of the methods of railroad building, overcapitalization, and reckless speculation, demonstrates the necessity of the valuation of railroad property as an indispensable basis for securing to the people of this country just and reasonable rates. Before this bill becomes a law I trust that the amendment which I shall offer, or some better one, will be incorporated, making full and complete provision at an early date for the true valuation of all the railroad property of the United States.

I can not refrain from suggesting, Mr. President, that the railroads of this country can no longer afford to oppose this valuation. It is best for them that it should be known. They contend that their railroads are worth the amount for which they are capitalized. The public contends that the capitalization is grossly in excess of the fair value and not a lawful basis for taxing transportation. This great issue between the public and the railroads can be juggled with no longer. It can not be settled by legislation which palliates the wrong. It must be settled by getting the true value, the fair value of railway property. If there is to be an end of antagonism and dissension between the people and the transportation companies, it can be found, sir, in no other way.

Mr. President, when it is remembered that the Interstate Commerce Commission is the only tribunal that stands between the railroads and the public; when it is considered that the power conferred upon the Commission is the power of Congress itself; that the Commission really represents the Government of the United States, and when we test the bill before us by the obligation of Congress to guard in full measure the public interest with all the sovereign power of the Federal Government, does not the proposed law seem to fall short of a just and comprehensive treatment of a great subject of legislation?

I would not be unfair. The bill is not bad in its provisions, but weak because of its omissions. I do not believe that the bill is framed to meet the demands of "special interests." Nor has any broad consideration of public interest dominated its construction.

It has neither ill intent nor high purpose. Expediency seems to have been the controlling factor in framing it.

It seems a response to the impelling necessity for some legislation.

It is probably just to the members of the committee who joined in reporting this bill to the Senate to say that it is their measure of the willingness of Congress to legislate on the subject; that it is as strong a bill as they believe could pass the Senate. But if this bill is not amended to meet the public need, if it should pass without being strengthened and improved, so as to make it a basis upon which to build substantially in the future, then it may as well be understood now that it will not quiet public interest nor prevent further demands. It will become the issue of a new campaign, more certain, more definite, and more specific than ever before.

This session of Congress will be but the preliminary skirmish of the great contest to follow. On the day that it is known that only the smallest possible measure of relief has been granted the movement will begin anew all over the country for a larger concession to public right. That movement will not stop until it is completely successful. The only basis upon which it can be settled finally in a free country is a control of the public-service corporations broad enough, strong enough, and strict enough to insure justice and equality to all American citizens.

Why pursue a shortsighted, temporizing course? Is it not worse than folly to believe that a country like ours, with all its glorious traditions, will surrender in this war for industrial independence?

Mr. President, the people of this generation have witnessed a revolution which has changed the industrial and commercial life of a nation. They have seen the business system of a century battered down, in violation of State and Federal statutes, and another builded on its ruins.

They know exactly what has happened and why it has happened.

The farmer knows that there is no open, free competitive market for anything he may produce upon his farm. He knows that he must accept the prices arbitrarily fixed by the beef trust and the elevator combination. He knows that both of these organizations have been given control of the markets by the railroads.

The independent manufacturer knows that he no longer has an open field and a fairly competitive chance to market his product against the trust with its railroad interests.

The consumer knows that his prices are made for him by those who control the avenues of trade and the highways of commerce. The public has suffered much. It demands relief.

Mr. President, Senators in this discussion have avowed that they were not to be influenced by popular clamor; that they have no sympathy with bigotry that is blind to great railway enterprise and the value of the services which these corporations render to the public. It has been denounced as meddlesome interference for anyone to question the right of the railways to fix the markets of this country and to control the destination of its commerce. Public discussion in support of this legislation is rebuked as "noisy declamation," and we are advised that public opinion should be scorned; that it is as shifting as the sands of the sea.

It has been suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that we might safely, from time to time, adopt "certain loose and general propositions" in the form of harmless resolutions, "which thunder in the index, and show that we are properly aroused to the dangers arising from corporations generally and from railroads in particular, and which do not commit us to any specific legislation."

Sir, I respect public opinion. I do not fear it. I do not hold it in contempt. The public judgment of this great country forms slowly. It is intelligent. No body of men in this country is superior to it. In a representative democracy the common judgment of the majority must find expression in the law of the land. To deny this is to repudiate the principles upon which representative democracy is founded.

It is not prejudice nor clamor which is pressing this subject upon the attention of this body. It is a calm, well-considered public judgment. It is born of conviction—not passion—and it were wise for us to give it heed.

The public has reasoned out its case. For more than a generation of time it has wrought upon this great question with heart and brain in its daily contact with the great railway corporations. It has mastered all the facts. It is just. It is honest. It is rational. It respects property rights. It well knows that its own industrial and commercial prosperity would suffer and decline if the railroads were wronged, their capital impaired, their profits unjustly diminished.

But the public refuses longer to recognize this subject as one which the railroads alone have the right to pass upon. It declines longer to approach it with awe. It no longer regards the railroad schedule as a mystery. It understands the meaning of rebates and "concessions," the evasions through "purchasing agents" and false weights, the subterfuge of "damage claims," the significance of "switching charges," "midnight tariffs," "milling in transit," "tap-line allowances," underbilling," and "demurrage charges." It comprehends the device known as the "industrial railway," the "terminal railway," and all the tricks of inside companies, each levying tribute upon the traffic. It is quite familiar with the favoritism given to express companies, and knows exactly how producer and consumer have been handed over by the railroads, to be plundered by private car and refrigerator lines, in exchange for their traffic.

The public has gone even deeper into the subject. It knows that transportation is vital to organized society; that it is a function of government; that railway lines are the public highways to market; that these highways are established under the sanction of government; that the railway corporation dictates the location of its right of way, lays its tracks over the property of the citizen without his consent, and that he must market the products of his capital and his labor over this highway, if at all, on the terms fixed by the railway corporation. Or, to say it arrogantly and brutally, as did the president of the Louisville and Nashville Railway Company in his testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission, that the public can pay the charge which the railroad demands, "or it can walk." In short, sir, the public has come to understand that the railway corporation is a natural monopoly, which has been created by act of government, and that under existing conditions the public is completely at the mercy of this natural monopoly.

Because it is a natural monopoly, because it is the creature of government, it becomes the duty of government to see to it that the railway company inflicts no wrong upon the public, to compel it to do what is right, and to perform its office as a common carrier.

Sir, it is much easier to stand with these great interests than against them. This was true when Adam Smith wrote his Wealth of Nations, and it is true in 1906. Writing of the struggle with monopoly in the eighteenth century, he said:

> The member of Parliament who supports every proposition for strengthening monopoly is sure to acquire great reputation for understanding trade, and also great popularity and influence with an order of men whose numbers and wealth render them of great importance. If he opposes them, on the contrary, and still more, if he have authority enough to thwart them, neither the most acknowledged probity, nor the highest rank, nor the greatest public service, can protect him from the most infamous abuse and detraction, from personal insults, nor sometimes from real danger arising from the influence of furious and disappointed monopolists.

At no time in the history of any nation has it been so difficult to withstand these forces as it is right here in America to-day. Their power is acknowledged in every community and manifest in every lawmaking body. It is idle to ignore it. There exists all over this country a distrust of Congress, a fear that monopolistic wealth holds the balance of power in legislation.

Mr. President, I contend here, as I have contended upon the public platform in Wisconsin, and in other States, that the history of the last thirty years of struggle for just and equitable legislation demonstrates that the powerful combinations of organized wealth and special interests have had an overbalancing control in State and national legislation.

For a generation the American people have watched the growth of this power in legislation. They observe how vast and far-reaching these modern business methods are in fact. Against the natural laws of trade and commerce is set the arbitrary will of a few masters of special privilege. The principal transportation lines of the country are so operated as to eliminate competition. Between railroads and other monopolies controlling great natural resources and most of the necessaries of life there exists a "community of interests" in all cases and an identity of ownership in many. They have observed that these great combinations are closely associated in business for business reasons; that they are also closely associated in politics for business reasons; that together they constitute a complete system; that they encroach upon the public rights, defeat legislation for the public good, and secure laws to promote private interests.

Is it to be marveled at that the American people have become convinced that railroads and industrial trusts stand between them and their representatives; that they have come to believe that the daily conviction of public officials for betrayal of public trust in municipal, State, and national government is but a suggestion of the potential influence of these great combinations of wealth and power?

During this debate there has been much talk about the country having "hysteria." Magazine writers and press correspondents have been denounced, and there would seem to be an agreement that they are to be pursued and discredited, lest they lodge in the popular mind a wrongful estimate of the public service.

Sir, it does not lie in the power of any or all of the magazines of the country or of the press, great as it is, to destroy, without justification, the confidence of the people in the American Congress. Neither can any man on earth, whatever his position or power, alter the settled conviction of the intelligent citizenship of this country when it is grounded on fact and experience. It rests solely with the United States Senate to fix and maintain its own reputation for fidelity to public trust. It will be judged by the record. It can not repose in security upon its exalted position and the glorious heritage of its traditions. It is worse than folly to feel, or to profess to feel, indifferent with respect to public judgment. If public confidence is wanting in Congress, it is not of hasty growth, it is not the product of "jaundiced journalism." It is the result of years of disappointment and defeat. It is the outgrowth of a quarter of a century of keen, discriminating study of public questions, public records, and the lives of public men.

In the Supreme Court, midway between the Senate and the House, Mr. Justice Brewer has, for a quarter of a century, investigated, analyzed, and construed the legislative work of Congress. A keen and critical observer of men and events, he can speak with wisdom on the development and tendencies of the day, and no man will dare to say that he speaks in passion or with any ulterior purpose.

In an address on "The ethical obligation of the lawyer as a lawmaker," before the Albany Law School, June 1, 1904, he said:

> No one can be blind to the fact that these mighty corporations are holding out most tempting inducements to lawmakers to regard in their lawmaking those interests rather than the welfare of the nation.
> Senators and Representatives have owed their places to corporate influence, and that influence has been exerted under an expectation, if not an understanding, that as lawmakers the corporate interests shall be subserved. * * *
> The danger lies in the fact that they are so powerful and that the pressure of so much power upon the individual lawmaker tempts him to forget the nation and remember the corporation. And the danger is greater because it is insidious.
> There may be no written agreement. There may be, in fact, no agreement at all, and yet, when the lawmaker understands that the power exists which may make for his advancement or otherwise and that it will be exerted according to the pliancy with which he yields to its solicitations, it lifts the corporation into a position of constant danger and menace to republican institutions.

For the first time in many years a great measure is before this body for its final action. The subject with which it deals goes to the very heart of the whole question. Out of railroad combination with monopoly and its power over legislation comes the perilous relation which Mr. Justice Brewer says "lifts the corporation into a position of constant danger and menace to republican institutions."

Sir, we have the opportunity to meet the demands of the hour, or we may weakly temporize while the storm continues to gather.

On Plymouth Rock eighty-six years ago Daniel Webster, looking with prophetic vision into the century beyond, uttered these words, which fall upon this day and generation as a solemn mandate:

> As experience may show errors in our establishments we are bound to correct them, and if any practices exist contrary to the principles of justice and humanity within the reach of our laws or our influence, we are inexcusable if we do not exert ourselves to restrain and abolish them.

Mr. President, our responsibility is great; our duty is plain. If a true spirit of independent, patriotic service controls Congress, this bill will be reconstructed on the broad basis of public interest.

I thank Senators for their attention throughout this protracted address. [Applause in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Manifestations of applause by the occupants of the galleries are forbidden by the rules of the Senate.

APPENDIX A.

Reviews of evidence submitted before committees of Congress, 1902–1905, showing condition of railway service and abuse of monopoly power by common carriers—discriminations and overcharges.

The complaints made to the Interstate Commerce Commission and to the committees of Congress have established three propositions.

First, discriminations are made by common carriers; second, transportation charges have advanced; third, the railroads delegate to others—private-car, freight, and refrigerator lines—important functions which should only be performed by Government or responsible common carriers. These companies do with impunity that which if done by common carriers would be criminal.

The evidence brought to light the many forms of discrimination which are practiced. There were instances of discriminations against places, against persons, and against commodities. There were discriminations shown in the published tariff rates and in the commodity rates and classifications. It was established that rebates, direct and indirect, special concessions providing additional servece or regular service at less than the published rates, were given to favored shippers. Manufacturer and jobber, producer and consumer complained. The complaints were confined to no one section of the country. They came from every section. Every section suffers in some particular and some in every particular.

DISCRIMINATIONS AGAINST LOCALITIES.

Probably the greatest amount of complaint made before the committees of Congress was of discriminations against localities. The railroads, following the policy of centralizing trade and industry, so as to give to them the greatest amount of transportation and the longest haul of freight, established a system of discriminations designed to ruin all centers or localities not so situated as to serve these ends and to promote and build up those centers and localities which would satisfy their requirements in these particulars. The public interest was not considered. The social economy of serving a given territory from the center which naturally would serve it best and cheapest was rejected as heresy. The railroad managers demand large tonnage, long hauls, large gross revenues.

The railroads are fighting nearly every interior center between the Atlantic coast and the head of the Great Lakes; every center between the Great Lakes and the Missouri River, and every center between the Missouri River and the Pacific coast. Only where water competition enters to control the rapacity of carriers is there any peace or feeling of security.

Interstate Commerce Commissioners testified that hundreds of complaints against the railroads are received which are never heard of because the complainant wants to know, before making the complaint formal, whether the Commission can grant the relief and afford protection from the wrath of the railroad. The railroad is a corporation and may be without a soul and without sentiment, but it has a policy. That policy spells ruin for any helpless enterprise or locality or individual which shall attempt to interfere with its programme of selfish aggrandizement.

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST CITY OF DANVILLE, VA.

This illustration of the city of Danville is possibly somewhat extraordinary. But there are certainly many other equally aggravated cases. The circumstances and conditions are typical of hundreds of places all over the United States. The city of Danville officially submitted, through Judge Aiken, of that city, a petition passed by the common council and the board of aldermen and signed by the city officials. This petition sets forth the exact nature of the situation. It is concise and to the point. It is as follows:

DANVILLE, VA., April 15, 1905.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The petition of the city of Danville respectfully represents that it is situated in the southern part of the State of Virginia, in Pittsylvania County, on the Dan River, at a point on the Southern Railroad where the different branches of that common carrier from Alexandria to the north, Richmond to the northeast, Norfolk to the east, and the line from the south and west unite, and has a population of 18,000 or 20,000 inhabitants, and numerous manufacturing and mercantile enterprises, besides being a large market for the sale of leaf tobacco. That its principal commercial rivals are the cities of Lynchburg and Richmond, Va., the former 65 miles to the north, and the latter 140 miles to the northeast of Danville.

Prior to the year 1886 petitioner enjoyed equal freight-rate advantages with the said cities of Lynchburg and Richmond through the competition of the railroad runnings north from Danville to Alexandria, known as the "Virginia Midland Railroad," but in that year the Southern Railroad Company purchased the Virginia Midland and deprived petitioner of the competing line and of its equal freight-rate advantages.

That in the year 1890 petitioner, to obtain another competing line of railroad, subscribed a large sum to the construction of a railroad from Norfolk to Danville, which road was built, but after operation a few years as an independent line it was purchased by the said Southern Railroad Company, and since said purchase the petitioner—the city of Danville—has had no competing line of railroad, but in the matter of freight and passenger rates has been entirely subject to the will and mercy of said Southern Railroad Company.

That the said Southern Railroad Company, and its connecting railways and steamship lines engaged in interstate commerce, have, by an agreement between them, established in the State of Virginia certain favored points to which they deliver commodities transported by them from the several States for less rate of transportation than they demand and receive for the transportation of similar commodities under similar conditions to other points in the State of Virginia, the haul and distance to said other points being shorter than to the favored points, by which the said lines of railway and steamship lines give undue preference and advantage to the persons and localities at said favored points. Two of these favored points are the said cities of Lynchburg and Richmond; and petitioner, the city of Danville, and the said two cities have been for many years active competitors for trade in the same territory, and the territory from which petitioner, by reason of its natural and superior location in the tobacco-growing region of Virginia and North Carolina, has for more than one-half a century drawn its patronage and trade support.

Petitioner states the said Southern Railroad and its waterway connections between Norfolk and the various cities of New England and the Middle States have established and put in force rates of transportation by which commodities and merchandise are transported by them from said northern and eastern points by way of Norfolk and Pinners Point through the city of Danville and delivered for less rates of transportation than similar commodities and merchandise from the same point over the same route are transported and delivered in the city of Danville.

To illustrate the excessive rate of discrimination against the city of Danville, petitioner will state that the said carriers classify freight for transportation, and on class 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, class A, B, C, D, E, F, and H, from Boston and Providence via Norfolk over the said railroad through Danville to Lynchburg, the long haul, the rate is, respectively, 54, 47, 38, 25, 22, 18, 18, 22, 18, 22, 36, 25, 25, and 18 cents per 100 pounds. On the same classes from the same point to Danville, the short haul, the rate is 75, 63, 52, 38, 34, 29, 29, 32, 29, 27, 34, 56, 38, 71, and 26 cents per 100 pounds, making a discrimination against Danville, in favor of Lynchburg, of 39, 34, 37, 52, 54, 61, 68, 45, 61, 50, 56, and 44 per cent on the respective classes. From New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore over the same route substantially the same rate of discrimination is made against Danville and in favor of Lynchburg on the different classes of freight.

Corresponding rates of discrimination are also enforced against the city of Danville and in favor of the cities of Lynchburg and Richmond on all property transported by the said Southern Railroad and its connections from points south and west of Virginia, the property being carried by said railroad through the city of Danville, the short haul, to the said favored cities, the long haul. Whenever merchandise destined for Danville from points in the West and Northwest over carriers connecting with the said Southern Railroad at Lynchburg reaches Lynchburg, the said Southern Railroad takes advantage of the carrying monopoly it has over property going to Danville and adds on most unreasonable rates from Lynchburg to Danville. For example, the rate on pork and bacon from Chicago to Lynchburg is 27 cents per cwt.; to Danville, 40 cents per cwt. The Southern Railroad charges 13 cents per cwt. for hauling 65 miles that which other roads charge 27 cents for hauling over 1,000 miles. The rate on refined sirup from Chicago to Lynchburg is 27 cents per cwt.; to Danville, 43 cents per cwt. The Southern Railroad charges 16 cents per cwt. for hauling 65 miles for what other roads haul over 1,000 for 27 cents per cwt. A carload of matches is shipped from Detroit to Lynchburg for 24½ cents per cwt. Danville is charged 47½ cents per cwt. The Southern Railroad charges 23 cents for hauling 65 miles what other roads haul 600 miles for 24 cents. On all other commodities, including grain, flour, ship-stuff, and other staple necessities purchased by Danville merchants in the West, as soon as they reach the Southern Railroad the same unreasonable and oppressive rates of freight are enforced against them. Thus it is shown that petitioner, the city of Danville, and its inhabitants are hedged on every side by the discriminating and unreasonable freight rates imposed by the said Southern Railroad Company, and are absolutely barred from the privilege of competing with their commercial rivals for the trade of the public.

Petitioner further shows that several years ago it presented its petition and complaint, setting forth in detail the wrongs herein stated, to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and after a hearing upon evidence the Commission decided that the rates put in force against the city of Danville should cease, and at the same time prescribed what it considered a reasonable rate to Danville; but said Commission not having power to enforce its order the said Southern Railroad did not obey it, but, on the contrary, continued to demand and receive from petitioner and its inhabitants the discriminating and unreasonable rates complained of. Petitioner begs to refer to the record of the case of the city of Danville against the Southern Railroad Company, recorded in the eighth volume of the Interstate Commerce Cases, in support of the allegations of the petition. And petitioner further avers that the rates in force then are in force now against the city of Danville and its inhabitants. The rate from Philadelphia, New York, and other northern markets via Norfolk over the water and railway lines of the Southern Railroad through Danville to Lynchburg, the long haul, on sugar is 21½ cents per cwt., while the rate over the same route to Danville, the short haul, is 26½ cents per cwt. On leather over the same route to Lynchburg the rate is 47 cents per cwt., and to Danville 64 cents per cwt. On coffee over the same route to Lynchburg the rate is 25 cents per cwt., and to Danville 36 cents per cwt. On hardware over the same route to Lynchburg the rate is 47 cents per cwt., and to Danville 62 cents per cwt.

That from New Orleans over the lines of the Southern Railroad through Danville to Richmond and Lynchburg the rate on molasses is 26 cents, sugar 32 cents, coffee 40 cents, rice 32 cents, and on the same articles to Danville 37, 63, 43, and 51 cents.

That from Atlanta, Ga., the rate on furniture to Lynchburg is 34 cents per cwt., and to Danville 64 cents per cwt.

That on grain from Louisville and Cincinnati over the same line through Danville to Lynchburg the rate is 12 cents per cwt., and to Danville 21 cents per cwt.; on flour 12 cents per cwt. to Lynchburg and 24 cents per cwt. to Danville; on meat and lard to Lynchburg 15 cents per cwt., and to Danville 27 cents; and that from every point in the South and West and on all commodities the rate of discrimination is of similar proportion against the city of Danville.

Besides the cities of Lynchburg and Richmond, with which Danville has traded in competition for over fifty years, the said Southern Railroad has begun to discriminate against Danville in favor of two small towns of not more than one-quarter of the population of Danville—the towns of Martinsville, 40 miles to the west, and South Boston, 30 miles to the east, where the Norfolk and Western Railroad competes with the Southern—and said Southern Railroad is now transporting commodities through Danville to both of those points at a less rate of freight than to Danville.

Petitioner in conclusion states that the wrongs and injuries complained of, by which these favored cities, its nearest commercial rivals, trading in the same territory to which Danville looks for trade, are given an unjust advantage of the latter, have been going on for eighteen years and until the consequence is becoming disastrous to Danville. It is depriving it of its trade, cutting down its population, increasing the cost of living to its people, diminishing the value of its real estate, and increasing the burden of taxation on its citizens in order to meet the interest on its corporate debt and the expense of its municipal government. Petitioner asserts that new business enterprises and capitalists seeking investments will not come to the city of Danville on account of the freight discrimination against it, and that extensive enterprises have refused to come and have gone elsewhere for that reason.

Petitioner is advised that railroads are public highways, and the fundamental characteristic of public highways is the right of all persons to use them upon equal terms. For railroads to deny this equality is a misuser of their franchises, and to permit them to build up one city or community at the expense of another, or to oppress the inhabitants of one community with burdens in order that favors may be bestowed upon others, is, it is respectfully submitted, an indefensible act of government.

This petitioner therefore prays that the interstate-commerce act may be so amended as to prohibit such undue advantages as are given the said favored cities over the city of Danville, and as to allow the Interstate Commerce Commission not only to decide what are discriminating and unreasonable rates on freight, but to prescribe and fix rates and to enforce its orders and judgments when they are made.

And petitioner will ever pray, etc.

CITY OF DANVILLE, VA.,
By E. L. SWAIN,
President of the Board of Aldermen of the Council of the City of Danville.
W. P. HODNETT,
President of the Common Council of the City of Danville.

The introduction of this petition occasioned an interesting controversy before the committees of the Senate. The Southern Railway Company, so it is generally believed at Danville at least, procured the appearance before the committees of six citizens of Danville, representing, as they declared, the "big business" interests of Danville. While they did not deny the statements of discriminations as presented by the petition and by Judge Aiken, they declared that Danville was not suffering from these discriminations and that in their business they found the rate satisfactory. This petition they declared was passed at a secret meeting of the city council and represented a manufactured sentiment.

The news of this stroke of railroad diplomacy, received at Danville, aroused a storm of public indignation. A mass meeting was held the following night, at which practically the entire citizenship of Danville, excepting the "six gentlemen," was represented. This mass meeting unanimously denounced the action of these "big business representatives" as "prejudicial and detrimental to the best interests of the city and especially to its mercantile and commercial growth and prosperity." They sent a representative of the city before the committee to expose the incentives of the six self-appointed representatives and the malice of their misstatements. And it developed that in no particular did these gentlemen correctly represent the conditions or their effects. Moreover, it appeared that of these six men three were directors in branch lines of the Southern Railway and also directors in a cotton milling company, which was generally believed to receive special rates on transportation from the Southern Railroad. One of these three was also a merchant and generally believed to be favored in his transportation service by the Southern Railway. A fourth member of this delegation was a director in another cotton milling company, which likewise received special rates, and also president of a bank which had recently been given the Southern Railway's account. The fifth member was a manufacturer of furniture also receiving special rates, and the sixth man was a politician, one of the two members in the city council of thirty who voted against sending the petition to Congress.

Mr. Withers, who appeared to represent the city and the mass meeting, showed that, with reference to outgoing freights, which these gentlemen had said were reasonable, leaf tobacco was the most vitally important of this traffic, constituting about 45,000,000 pounds per year. Much of this is consigned to Louisville, Ky., for manufacture. The rate from Lynchburg and Richmond was 24 cents per 100 pounds, while from Danville—66 to 140 miles less distance and over the same line—the rate was 40 cents.

Being questioned by the committee with reference to the coal rates, Mr. Withers declared that the discriminations on coal to Danville from the various western fields were absolutely prohibitive except from a single source, over a single line—the Norfolk and Western. He said: "We never see a pound of Chesapeake and Ohio coal * * * we never see a pound of Southern Railroad coal. We are not permitted to haul any of the Tennessee coal, the West Virginia coal, the Pocahontas, or from other western fields, and, further, the haul from Lynchburg to these fields is $1.60 per ton, while the haul to Danville is $2.30, a discrimination of 70 cents for a 65-mile haul." And he filed with the committee the coal tariffs, which are full of these discriminations.

This example of Danville illustrates the situation. Danville is an old offender. It refused to accept the yoke of the Southern Railway. In three instances has it attempted by subsidizing competing lines to Danville to break the power which the Southern Railway held over that city. The aggregate municipal indebtedness incurred for this purpose amounts to about $400,000 and constitutes over a third of the total interest-bearing indebtedness of Danville. Each time a competing line has been so built it has finally passed into the control, by lease or ownership, of the Southern Railway. The city is to-day without any benefit from these great expenditures, and it is appealing to Congress for some protection from the reprisals of the Southern Railway.

DISCRIMINATIONS AGAINST THE CITY OF ATLANTA, GA.

Atlanta, like Danville, is situated advantageously for industrial and commercial intercourse with a large surrounding territory—advantageously in all respects except railroad transportation. Atlanta has offended. It has complained. Its rates have been raised; its business has been taken away and bestowed upon favored competitors. It suffers most in competition with the coast city of Savannah, which is protected by water competition; but it also complains of discriminations as compared with other interior cities. Atlanta submits that the average distance to seventy-eight southeastern towns of 4,000 population is from—

	Miles.
Atlanta	288
Savannah	360
Birmingham	319

Despite the central location of Atlanta, the general and systematic discrimination in freight tariffs precluded the development of the jobbing and manufacturing business. An instance cited before the Commission was the removal of the Pittsburg Plate Glass Company from Atlanta to Savannah, taking with it a weekly pay roll of about $1,000 and 300 to 500 of the city's population. The rate on glass from Pittsburg was 66 cents per 100 pounds to Atlanta, as against 31 cents to Savannah. Because of this discrimination the company could ship to Savannah and distribute its product into Atlanta territory at so much better advantage than from Atlanta that it was constrained to move its plant.

As illustrating the discriminations against Atlanta jobbers, the rates on boots and shoes from Boston to Atlanta and neighboring centers were cited: Atlanta, $1.14; Augusta, $0.96; Charleston, $0.70; Jacksonville, $0.73; Knoxville, $1; Macon, $1.09; Memphis, $1; Mobile, $0.75; New Orleans, $0.95, and Nashville, $0.91.

These discriminations are maintained in the face of the fact that Atlanta handles about 50 per cent more boots and shoes than any one of the other points. It is notable that these discriminations are not so much in favor of any particular point, but particularly against the city of Atlanta.

DISCRIMINATIONS AGAINST THE CITY OF ST. LOUIS.

The city of St. Louis, in many lines of its business, affords a remarkable example of the policy of the railroads in limiting, so far as within their power lies, the number of basic points or commercial centers. At the city of St. Louis there is the Merchants' Exchange, an organization with a membership of 1,790. It is said to be "the leading commercial organization of the Mississippi Valley." There is also the St. Louis Manufacturing Association, embracing 250 of the principal manufacturing concerns of St. Louis. These two organizations appeared through a common representative, Mr. William Kennett, before the committee of the Senate. Mr. Kennett presented the situation, showing that the rates at St. Louis were in many respects unreasonable, discriminatory, and unstable. He submitted a series of exhibits prepared by the St. Louis Traffic Bureau, setting forth this situation in detail. The St. Louis Traffic Bureau is jointly supported by the Merchants' Exchange and the Business Men's League of that city.

One of these exhibits, for instance, gives the rates on bags and burlap, C. L. and L. C. L., from St. Louis and from New Orleans to forty-three manufacturing centers and consuming points distributed over Illinois, Kentucky, Indiana, Ohio, Missouri, and Wisconsin. Throughout this statement, when the great discrepancy in distance is taken into account, there appear unwarranted discriminations in the rates against St. Louis as compared with New Orleans.

Examples of these rates on carload shipments are as follows:

To Cairo, Ill., from New Orleans, 555 miles, 13 cents per 100 pounds; from St. Louis, 149 miles, 14½ cents per 100 pounds.

To Hickman, Ky., from New Orleans, 521 miles, 13 cents per 100 pounds; from St. Louis, 214 miles, 18 cents per 100 pounds.

To Louisville, Ky., from New Orleans, 789 miles, 13 cents per 100 pounds; from St. Louis, 271 miles, 17 cents per 100 pounds.

To Cincinnati, Ohio, from New Orleans, 830 miles, 14 cents per 100 pounds; from St. Louis, 336 miles, 17 cents per 100 pounds.

To Milwaukee, Wis., from New Orleans, 997 miles, 17 cents per 100 pounds; from St. Louis, 365 miles, 20 cents per 100 pounds.

Examples of these rates on less than carload shipments are as follows:

To Cairo, Ill., from New Orleans, 555 miles, 25 cents per 100 pounds; from St. Louis, 149 miles, 19 cents per 100 pounds.

To Evansville, Ind., from New Orleans, 709 miles, 25 cents per 100 pounds; from St. Louis, 162 miles, 19 cents per 100 pounds.

To Cincinnati, Ohio, from New Orleans, 830 miles, 27½ cents per 100 pounds; from St. Louis, 336 miles, 25 cents per 100 pounds.

To Lexington, Ky., from New Orleans, 748 miles, 27½ cents per 100 pounds; from St. Louis, 376 miles, 38½ cents per 100 pounds.

Another exhibit sets forth that St. Louis is discriminated against in neighboring southeastern cities as compared with Atlantic seaboard and other interior points. Rates are quoted comparatively from St. Louis and from Richmond, Lynchburg, and Norfolk, Va., to six leading business and commercial centers in Alabama and Georgia. This exhibit embraces about 290 rates, and without notable exception these rates uniformly indicate this situation of the discrimination against the city of St. Louis as contended by Mr. Kennett. These rates are given on the six merchandise classes in each instance. I have computed the average rate and the average discrimination on the several classes per 100 pounds of freight in a few typical instances.

For example, the distance from St. Louis to Florence, Ala., is 378 miles, and from Cincinnati is 427 miles. The St. Louis rates average 6½ cents higher per 100 pounds. Similarly the rates to Florence from St. Louis average 14.8 cents higher than from Louisville, Ky., and 7½ cents higher than from Savannah, Ga.

To Birmingham, Ala., from St. Louis, 499 miles, these rates average 6½ cents higher than from Cincinnati, 481 miles, and 15.8 cents higher than from Savannah, 423 miles.

To Montgomery, Ala., the rates from St. Louis, 609 miles, average 6½ cents higher than from Cincinnati, 577 miles, and 24½ cents higher than from Richmond, Va., 754 miles.

To Atlanta, Ga., from St. Louis, 611 miles, the rates average 27 cents higher than from Richmond, Va., 555 miles.

To Macon, Ga., from St. Louis, 699 miles, the rates average 14.8 cents higher than from Cincinnati, 580 miles; and 14.8 cents higher than from Louisville, 560 miles, and 26.2 cents higher than from Richmond, 611 miles.

To Columbus, Ga., from St. Louis, 657 miles, the rates average 23.7 cents higher than from Richmond, Va., 676 miles.

Because the railroads fail to make a through tariff of reasonable rates from St. Louis into the "Cotton Belt" territory of Arkansas, it is cheaper to ship goods—cotton piece goods, for instance—into Arkansas on the local rate, and then to rebill to destination within the State on the Arkansas State railroad commissioner's tariff. For example, the through rate from St. Louis to Fordyce, Ark., is $1.15 per 100 pounds. The rate from St. Louis to Pine Bluff, Ark., is 60 cents per 100 pounds, and the rate from Pine Bluff, Ark., to Fordyce, Ark., under the State railroad commissioner's tariff is 24 cents. The total of the two local rates making 84 cents. This gives the excess representing the unreasonableness of the through rate at 29 cents. A similar situation is shown to prevail with respect to some fifteen other points in this territory.

Another statement submits the rates from St. Louis, from Richmond, Lynchburg, and Norfolk, Va., to the same points. The distance from the Atlantic seaboard and other Virginia cities is about twice as great as from St. Louis. The rates on less than carload shipments from the Virginia cities range from 80 cents to 53 cents per 100 pounds, while from St. Louis they range from $1.17 to 74 cents per 100 pounds. Similar discriminations prevail on commodity rates. For instance, on L. C. L. shipments of bagging the rate from the Virginia cities is 84½ cents, and from St. Louis, one-half the distance, 74 cents per 100 pounds. On canned goods from the Virginia cities it is 70 cents, and from St. Louis 74 cents per 100 pounds; on roasted coffee from the Virginia cities 63 cents, and from St. Louis 74 cents per 100 pounds.

Another statement shows comparatively the rates on wheat, corn, and oats from St. Louis and from Kansas City to eighty or ninety consuming points in Arkansas and Louisiana. The Kansas City rates presented range all the way from 28 to 12 cents per 100 pounds. In every instance the St. Louis rate is exactly 2 cents per 100 pounds higher, representing a discrimination of from 7.2 to 16.7 per cent against St. Louis in favor of the Missouri River points. This discrimination amounts to 0.64 cent per bushel on oats, 1.12 cents on corn, and 1.2 cents on wheat. When grain men have testified that from one-sixteenth to one-eighth of a cent per bushel on grain will determine where the business will go, it is evident these discriminations are sufficient to exclude St. Louis from competition in the distribution of grain to these Arkansas and Louisiana points.

Similarly the roads discriminate against St. Louis in the rates on grain from producing points as compared with the rates to Chicago and New Orleans. This is done in many instances by refusing to make a through tariff from producing points to St. Louis. The accepted reasonable differential from Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, and Indian Territory to Chicago, on account of the much greater distance, is 3 cents per 100 pounds over St. Louis. But the Santa Fe refuses to make through tariffs from many points in these States to St. Louis. The rates from these points therefore must be made up by combinations of local rates. The totals of these locals to St. Louis in such cases gives rates on wheat 1, 2, 2½, and even 3 cents per 100 pounds higher than to Chicago, and 1½, 2, 3, 3½, 4, and even 5 cents per 100 pounds higher on grain.

Another feature of the rate situation at St. Louis which occasioned much serious complaint, is the instability of the differential maintained between the rates from St. Louis to neighboring and distant markets and the rates from Kansas City and other Missouri River points to the same markets. During a recent so-called "rate war," most violent fluctuations occurred in the relation between these rates on grain, owing to discriminations and rate cutting in favor of Kansas City, St. Joseph, Atchison, and Leavenworth, as against St. Louis. Normally (that is for the greater part of the time) a reasonable differential is maintained favoring St. Louis to nearer points, but at times, and without warning, these differentials are destroyed and sometimes even substituted by differentials favoring Missouri River. For example, during the period in question, the normal differential of 4 cents per 100 pounds favoring St. Louis as against the Missouri River in the rate to Memphis, which is only about 300 miles down the river from St. Louis, was changed to a differential of 1 cent per 100 pounds against St. Louis. To New Orleans the differential favoring St. Louis of 7 cents per 100 pounds on grain for export was reduced to only 2 cents per 100 pounds. To Newport, Ark., as well as Hoxie, Walnut Ridge and Nettleton, the favorable differential for St. Louis of 2 cents was changed to an adverse differential of 4 cents. To New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Newport News the differential favoring St. Louis of 8 cents per 100 pounds on grain was changed to a differential against St. Louis of 3 cents per 100 pounds. And similar fluctuations were complained of as compared with Omaha.

DISCRIMINATIONS AGAINST DENVER, COLO.

The city of Denver is another one of those intermediate points, surrounded by a large consuming territory, which it could serve economically and to the mutual advantage of producer and consumer as a jobbing center. But the railroads have decreed that it shall not be. They have established distributing centers on the Missouri River, and ocean transportation has established others on the Pacific coast. The discriminations in the freight tariffs prohibit any extensive jobbing business between these extremes. Aside from purposes of favoratism to Missouri River cities, this discrimination obviously subserves the railroad interests by preventing the development of adequate jobbing centers in the Denver section, and thereby perpetuating the long-haul traffic in the less than carload freight at high rates from the Missouri River to all this territory.

It is the selfish interests of the railroads only that are considered. The consumers want a convenient jobbing center; it is demanded by the public interest generally. Naturally, Denver wants to do this business and feels keenly the injustice which denies this privilege to which its right is clear.

The Denver Chamber of Commerce and Board of Trade and the Denver Freight Bureau, a shipper's institution, united in sending Mr. William A. Hover to Washington to lay the situation before the committee of the Senate. Mr. Hover submitted a most exhaustive statement, setting forth in hundreds of illustrations and freight-rate comparisons the systematic discrimination which prohibits the commercial development of the city of Denver.

Through all this extensive territory lying about Denver, extending over Wyoming, Utah, New Mexico, and parts of Idaho and Montana, there is no jobbing center of importance. The bulk of all merchandise and supplies to all this territory must be shipped in by the retail dealer from the head of the Lakes, Missouri River, or the Pacific coast, at rates of freight ranging from $1 to $4 per 100 pounds. This condition is maintained by the refusal of the carriers to make reasonable rates to and from Denver, based on its relative nearness to the sources of supply and its central location with reference to consuming points. Rates to Denver from eastern points are higher than to the Pacific coast and as high as the rates to other interior points several hundred miles farther west. The local rates from Denver to tributary points are so high that, when added to the rates to Denver, the combination is absolutely prohibitive of the distribution of traffic through this center. As illustrations of this situation with reference to Colorado consuming points, I take the following from Mr. Hover's statement:

"In making these comparisons I will in most cases, in order to save time and a useless array of figures, speak in terms of first class.

"From Denver to Douglas the distance is 275 miles, from Omaha to Douglas 584 miles, over a territory of about the same character and at about the same cost of construction. The rate from Denver is $1.11½ per 100 pounds; from Omaha, $1.86. Adding to the Denver rate the Colorado common-point rate of $1.25 makes the Denver combination $2.36½ to Douglas. The Denver rate to Douglas is built up as follows: The Union Pacific and Colorado and Southern combine on a rate to Orin Junction, distant from Denver 261 miles, of 80 cents. To this is added a prohibitive local by the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Road of 31½ cents arbitrary from Orin Junction to Douglas, a distance of 14 miles.

"To Casper the Denver rate is $1.52, distance 328 miles; from Omaha, $1.90, distance 637 miles. Combination via Denver, $2.77, with a prohibitive local from Orin Junction of 72 cents for a 67-mile haul."

With reference to discriminations against Denver in the nearby consuming territory of Wyoming, a similar situation is set forth.

Similar discriminations are also presented for those portions of Idaho, which, because of the direct railway connections are in a measure tributary to Denver, as a distributing center.

In the case of Utah points, a still more aggravated situation is depicted. Mr. Hover said:

"It is in dealing with the Utah situation that we find the most extreme instances of discrimination. Utah can more properly be considered Denver territory in competition with Missouri River points than can localities in either Wyoming, Idaho, or Montana. The State of Utah bounds Colorado on the west, and depends for transportation of westbound commodities on two lines of railroad owned and controlled by two of our great transcontinental systems—namely, the Harriman system and the Gould system—by the former over the Union Pacific from Omaha to Ogden, and by the latter over the Rio Grande Western from Grand Junction, Colo., to Salt Lake City, the Rio Grande Western being the outlet for both the Colorado Midland and the Denver and Rio Grande at Grand Junction. From Denver, through the medium of the two latter roads, we have direct connection with Utah, and a certain percentage of the westbound tonnage consigned to Utah points passes through Denver over one or the other of these two lines. Therefore Denver can justly claim the right of distribution into this territory on the same terms that are accorded Missouri River towns, St. Louis, Chicago, and other eastern points. On the present basis of rates, however, Denver merchants can not even get into Utah on as favorable a basis as the merchant located in San Francisco who ships his goods through Denver to San Francisco and back again to Salt Lake City, which fact I will later prove.

"The following are the competitive class rates to Utah common points, consisting of Ogden, Salt Lake City, Spanish Fork, and intermediate points:

	First.	Second.	Third.	Fourth.	Fifth.
From Chicago and Duluth	$3.10	$2.65	$2.15	$1.75	$1.45
From Missouri River	2.30	2.00	1.70	1.43	1.18
From San Francisco and California common points	1.72½	1.50	1.27½	1.07	.88½
From Denver	1.85	1.60	1.36	1.15	.96
Denver combination based upon the Missouri River	3.10	2.60	2.16	1.80	1.46

"In other words, the Denver merchant is discriminated against in favor of the merchant located on the Missouri River to the extent of 80 cents, first class; 60 cents, second; 46 cents, third; 37 cents fourth, and 28 cents, fifth, and this discrimination extends clear back to Atlantic seaboard territory. Such commodities as we produce in Denver are likewise discriminated against in favor of eastern centers. For instance, beer from our Denver breweries takes a 70-cent commodity rate to Utah common points, and the same rate applies from the Missouri River, notwithstanding that Denver is distant from Omaha 572 miles and from Kansas City 640 miles. On packing-house products the rate from Denver is 73½ cents, against $1.18 from the Missouri River. Generally speaking, however, it is on the class rates that the greatest discrimination exists. This difference against Denver diverts practically all the business moving under class rates from Denver to eastern centers. The situation as applied to Utah is particularly aggravated in view of the fact, as before recited, that San Francisco merchants can ship through Denver, through Salt Lake City, to San Francisco on a commodity rate and return the same goods to Salt Lake City on the local rate, and for less than the same goods can be unloaded in Denver and reshipped to Salt Lake City, notwithstanding the fact that San Francisco is distant from and beyond Salt Lake City 826 miles, while Denver lies 627 miles to the east of that point. Referring to the above table of rates you will note that Denver pays $1.85 to Salt Lake City, a distance of 627 miles, against a return rate of $1.72½ from San Francisco and California common points to Salt Lake City, a distance of 826 miles.

"I will now proceed to show how the application of this combination of rates will admit of the possibility, as above set forth; for instance, a mixed car of drugs, patent medicines, chemicals, etc., takes a commodity rate from New York of $1.40 a carload to California common points. This rate, combined with the local back of $1.72½, lays the goods down in Salt Lake City for $3.12½. To Denver the same commodities take a water rate via Galveston of $2.33 per 100 pounds, or an all-rail rate of $2.72 per 100 pounds. Adding to these rates the local out of Denver to Salt Lake City of $1.85 brings the cost of these commodities when shipped to and from Denver to $4.18, when the water rate is taken advantage of, and $4.15 on the all-rail rate. I will take the case of a wholesale boot and shoe dealer doing business in Denver and in San Francisco; rubber boots and shoes take a commodity rate from New York to San Francisco of $1.35 a carload. Adding to this the local first class back to Salt Lake City of $1.72½, and the cost is to the Salt Lake dealer $3.07½. To Denver the wholesaler pays for his good coming by way of the water line via Galveston $2.33, and if they come by all rail $2.72. Adding to these figures the local of $1.85, it will cost to lay them down in Salt Lake City $4.18 in the one instance, and $4.57 in the other instance, as against the San Francisco rate of $3.07½. These comparisons can be multiplied almost indefinitely and will apply to nearly every commodity handled by wholesalers located at either point. The conditions as pertaining to Utah business are more fully set forth, and comparisons more completely made in a table which is marked 'Exhibit G.'"

Similar discriminations are set forth in detail in the other exhibits covering the rest of this Denver territory.

DISCRIMINATIONS AGAINST SPOKANE, WASH.

At Spokane a rate situation in many respects worse, if possible, than at Denver is shown. Mr. Brooks Adams, who appeared before the Senate committee on behalf of the Chamber of Commerce at Spokane, presented a situation of grossest discrimination against Spokane as compared with the coast cities 318 to 400 miles farther west. One reason for this discrimination is the competition which exists at coast points with water transportation.

The rates on all supplies from eastern sources to Spokane are made up by adding together the rates from the point of shipment to the coast plus the local rates from the coast back to Spokane. This makes the cost of all commodities for consumption at Spokane much greater, and the cost of living therefore much higher, than at the coast cities, which receive supplies and material over the same lines and through the city of Spokane. On class freight the amount of these discriminations per 100 pounds is as follows: First class, $1.48; second class, $1.33; third class, $1.02; fourth class, 82 cents. On the carload classes it ranges from 50 to 70 cents per 100 pounds; that is, it costs the receiver of freight at Spokane this amount per 100 pounds more on these several classes on all freight from points east of the mountains than the cost of hauling the same freight through Spokane 400 miles farther to the coast.

The carload traffic moves largely under commodity rates, and as illustrations of the situation with regard to this traffic a table was submitted showing these commodity rates, side by side, for Spokane and the coast cities. This table embraces 83 commodity rates from Boston, New York, Chicago, and the Missouri River points to Spokane and to the coast cities, and covers carload shipments of 76 different commodities. In every instance the rates to Spokane are very much higher than to the coast cities about 400 miles farther west. A few examples of these rates are as follows:

Commodity.	Rates per 100 pounds.		Excess for Spokane.
	Coast.	Spokane.	Amount per 100 pounds.	Per cent.
Agricultural implements from New York and Boston	$1.25	$1.75	$0.50	40
Building paper from New York	.75	1.29	.54	72
Wrapping paper from New York	1.20	2.00	.80	67
Agricultural implements from Chicago	1.25	1.65	.40	32
Canned goods from Chicago	.95	1.35	.40	42
Coffee from Chicago	.90	1.38	.48	53
Clothing from Chicago	1.50	2.35	.85	57
Dry goods, etc., from Chicago	1.00	1.85	.85	85
Cotton, duck, and denim from Chicago	.90	1.75	.85	94
Nails and wire from Chicago	.65	1.10	.45	69
White lead from Chicago	.80	1.21	.41	51
Agricultural implements from Missouri River points	1.15	1.45	.30	26
Average of 83 commodity rates to above points	1.231	1.957	.726	59

On ten important commodities selected at random from the table submitted to the Senate committee there is in every instance gross and unwarranted discrimination against Spokane. On these ten commodities the rates to the coast cities range from 65 cents to $1.50 per 100 pounds, and to Spokane from $1.10 to $2.35 per 100 pounds. The excess in the rates for Spokane ranges from 30 cents to 85 cents per 100 pounds, and the per cent of excess against Spokane ranges from 26 to 94 per cent. On the whole 83 rates presented in Mr. Adams' table the average of the rates to the coast is $1.231, and to Spokane $1.957, showing an average overcharge for Spokane of 72.6 cents per 100 pounds, or 59 per cent. That is, on the average carload shipment under the commodity rates Spokane pays about 60 per cent more freight charges than the coast cities are charged for 400 or 500 miles greater service over the same line, a large proportion of the coast freight passing through Spokane en route.

It is not only as a consuming and distributing point that Spokane complains of discrimination in freight rates, but as a manufacturing center as well. Manufacturing growth is prohibited, and that development already attained is being undermined and destroyed by these systematic discriminations and overcharges. The discriminations submitted—for instance the rates on iron and steel articles—are prohibitive of any industry in which these commodities enter as important raw material. On most of this material the rates to Spokane from the Pittsburg district are about $10 per ton more than to the coast. On plain castings from Chicago the Spokane rate exceeds the coast rate by an amount equal to $14 per ton. An incident in this connection was related by Mr. Adams in this language:

"Up until a little over a year ago the freight rate on pig iron from Alabama to Spokane was $21.50 per ton, or $6.80 per ton more than the coast rate from the same point. The only way local manufacturers were able to force a reduction of the rate was to buy the pig iron in the foreign market, have it shipped as ballast to Portland, and thence by rail to Spokane. By this arrangement they were enabled to get their pig iron laid down in Spokane at a cost of $27.80 per ton, against $30.80 per ton if shipped from Alabama. The railroads seeing that a reduction would have to be made to meet the so-called 'water competition, secretly made a rate of $13 per ton, the coast rate, which rate was later published."

Similarly, the sash and window manufacture as an extensive industry at Spokane has been killed by the freight rate discrimination on window glass from Pittsburg. The following is Mr. Adams's statement:

"In the manufacture of sash the pine and cedar lumber of eastern Washington is much superior to the coast fir, yet, while there are five factories engaged in the manufacture of sash in Spokane, they manufacture only for local trade, and there are two concerns in the city which compete with the local factories and buy their sash from coast factories. The rate on window glass from Pittsburg to Spokane is $1.38½ per 100 pounds. The rate to Portland, Seattle, and other coast points is 90 cents, thus enabling the coast manufacturers to furnish the finished product for the price of glass to the Spokane manufacturer. The William Musser Lumber and Manufacturing Company, which started in business here in 1902, would have invested $75,000 in a sash factory and employed 50 hands, if it would have been possible to get a 90-cent rate on glass. The railroads also allow the coast manufacturers to ship sash in mixed carloads with lumber, which takes the lumber rate, hence enabling them to lay down manufactured sash in Spokane for $1.10 freight charges against $1.38½, the rate charged for glass to Spokane manufacturers. Every sash factory in Spokane would be forced out of business if it were not for the steady local market demanding special sizes, which are included in the regular millwork for new buildings. The wonderful building activity of Spokane in the past five years made it possible for the mills to manufacture sash. As it is, the coast manufacturers supply the local market for nearly all sash in regular sizes."

Discriminations in the rates against the lumber industry at Spokane are presented by Mr. Adams in the following comparisons:

"The rate on lumber from Portland, Oreg., Seattle, Wash., and kindred territory to Spokane, Wash., is 20 cents via the northern lines.

"The rate on lumber from Spokane, Wash., and kindred territory to Portland, Oreg., Seattle, Wash., and like territory is 26 cents via the northern lines."

* * * * * * *

"The rate on lumber from Portland, Oreg., via the Northern Pacific, to St. Paul, Minneapolis, and Duluth, Minn., is 40 cents.

"The rate on lumber from Spokane and kindred territory to the same points, is 40 cents, although the haul is in no case less than 540 miles shorter and in some cases 625 miles, via the same line."

* * * * * * *

"The rate on lumber, via the Great Northern, from Seattle and kindred territory to St. Paul, Minneapolis, and Duluth, Minn., is 40 cents.

"The rate on lumber from Spokane and kindred territory, via the Great Northern, to St. Paul, Minneapolis, and Duluth is 40 cents, although the haul is on an average of 400 miles shorter."

* * * * * * *

"The greatest distance lumber is hauled east from Portland, Oreg., on a 20-cent rate is not less than 687 miles.

"The greatest distance lumber is hauled east over the Northern Pacific from Spokane on a 21-cent rate is 385 miles, and this rate is made by various combinations which do not include all articles manufactured from lumber included in the regular classification."

* * * * * * *

"The greatest distance lumber is hauled east from Seattle, via the Great Northern, is 348 miles on a 20-cent rate.

"The greatest distance lumber is hauled east from Spokane, via the Great Northern, on a 20-cent rate is 216 miles."

As an illustration of a manufacturing industry being driven away from Spokane by the freight-rate discriminations, after it had been established and was doing an extensive business from Spokane, the experience of the Pacific Coast Pipe Company was submitted by Mr. Adams in the following statement:

"The Pacific Coast Pipe Company started to manufacture wired wooden pipe in the spring of 1900. The company owns patents on the machinery it uses, and started with four hands. There was at that time but one factory of this kind on the north Pacific coast, located at Seattle. The rate on manufactured pipe from Seattle to Spokane was 46 cents per 100 pounds C. L. plus the local rate from Spokane to all points east. This rate was entirely satisfactory and enabled the Spokane factory within a little over three years after beginning operations to increase its plant to 50 hands, with an investment of $50,000. The Seattle factory, backed by the big lumber firms on the coast, finding a serious competitor in the Spokane field, got the railroads to put manufactured pipe under the lumber classification, thus reducing the rate from Seattle to Spokane from 46 to 20 cents per 100 pounds.

"Prior to the cut rates in favor of the coast the Spokane factory had as territory all of eastern Washington, Idaho, and Montana, and, as stated above, was shipping pipe at the rate of two carloads per day. The loss of the factory here means the loss of fifty families and a pay roll of about $3,000 per month. It is needless to say that water competition did not enter into this rate discrimination, as no wood pipe is shipped via ocean to interior points. You must understand that while the railroads, under the protest of the local factory, put back the rate to 46 cents from Seattle to Spokane, refused and are still refusing to adjust the rate to points east of Spokane; hence wood pipe manufactured on the coast takes the lumber rate in all territory east of Spokane, thus making it impossible for a Spokane factory to compete in this territory. Considering the increased cost of manufacture at Spokane and the fact that there is not sufficient business to maintain a factory without outside territory, the Spokane factory had to be abandoned."

THE SMALLER PLACES.

The foregoing illustrations, taken from the testimony, give some idea of the discriminations in freight rates in force, as they affect a few of our larger cities. These are cases in which the evidence is definite, clear-cut, and all to the same effect. They are conspicuous examples. Less conspicuous, perhaps, but far more important to the consuming public, is the far-reaching, systematic discrimination which exists against the smaller cities, towns, and hamlets in every State. The small place is hopeless and helpless. There is no railroad competition at these points. In most instances there never has been any. It is the common practice to make the rates to such places just as high as the rates to the big commercial center beyond, with little reference to how much farther it is beyond. Frequently, particularly in the western part of the country, this rule is varied so that the small place pays the rate to the competitive point beyond plus the local rate back. In other words, over large sections of the country, small places are in substantially the same position with reference to the larger places that Spokane holds with reference to the Pacific coast terminals.

This situation was set forth by Judge Cowan in his testimony, as follows:

"Let me call your attention to the fact that a merchant situated in a little town east of a given commercial emporium in thousands of cases in this country must pay the rate of freight to the farther distant point and the local rate of freight back."

Interstate Commerce Commissioner Fifer appeared before the Senate committee and submitted several illustrations of this form of discrimination. One of these instances was the case of the city of Charlotte, a city of 20,000 population, lying half way between New Orleans and the Virginia cities—Richmond, Lynchburg, and Norfolk. In this case the rates from New Orleans to Charlotte were twice as high as from New Orleans to the Virginia cities, to which the traffic passed through Charlotte. That rate per ton per mile in these cases was four times as great to Charlotte as to the Virginia cities.

Another illustration of the same thing is the "blanket" or postage-stamp schedule, applying from all territory between the Atlantic Ocean and the Missouri River to the Pacific coast. The rate generally is exactly the same from Omaha, Chicago, Pittsburg, or New York, or any other point in all this territory to the coast, even though the distance be twice as great in one case as in the other. Commissioner Fifer declared that under the law as at present interpreted by the court there was no corrective for this sort of discrimination.

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST COMMODITIES.

By classification.—Conspicuous examples of discrimination against commodities are found throughout freight classifications. The hundreds of changes in classification of commodities from one class to another by the railroad classification committees in the last few years bear testimony to this fact.

Classification of freight is based on what the traffic will bear. It is a part of the rate. There is scarcely any evidence in the classifications that any rule of reason or science has been applied. It is a case of "cut and try." The tariff expert puts the commodity in a class, and then, if the complaint is too vigorous, he probably lowers it, and if not he raises it until he thinks it yields all the revenue the traffic will bear. Thus the classification of a commodity often depends largely upon the financial strength of the concerns principally interested in its production and distribution. Such a system could not but lead to discriminations. Moreover, it leads to confusion. Very often the railroad officials are themselves unable to agree as to the meaning of the classifications.

Mr. Wagner, a manufacturer of North Milwaukee, gave the committee an instance in his experience in attempting to "deal directly with the railroads," which is illustrative of the success in such undertakings of small shippers who are not favored. In part, Mr. Wagner said:

"We are making large quantities of rough, unfinished hardware, which we have been shipping out to our customers for a number of years as 'iron forgings,' taking a fourth-class rate. Last year the inspectors raised all our shipments to 'ferrules,' taking a third-class rate, and making a difference of about 50 per cent in our freight rates. We took samples of these goods and submitted them to the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul officials here, also, to the Milwaukee official of the railroad inspection bureau, and they both agreed with us in calling the goods 'iron forgings,' entitling them to the fourth-class rate. We then corresponded with the chairman of the official classification committee, who has control of the inspection, giving him data which showed that according to the value per pound, weight per cubic foot, and finish of the goods the fourth-class rate should apply. The railroads claim that these three items are what determine the classification of an article.

"Our communication was not acted upon favorably, and as there was a meeting of the committee at Chicago, the writer went down there and saw Mr. Gill, the chairman, personally, but without doing any good. He remarked to me at the time that this difference in classification on that portion of our product would amount to only a few hundred dollars a year, and if I would spend the same time and energy in some other branch of our business it would bring better returns financially. In the light of our previous experience of four or five years in endeavoring to secure equitable rates, etc., his remark was certainly true, but is it not a sad commentary on the state of affairs in a country like ours that this should be the case?

"Aside from the justice or injustice of our claims, is it not placing a tremendous power in the hands of one man, or let us say a committee of a dozen men, all paid and controlled by one of the interested parties—that is, the railroads—to determine absolutely whether any shipper or consumer shall pay a just rate or something far higher? Where is there a more powerful trust than this little committee which is accountable to no one but its masters, who are interested in securing high rates, and which controls this subject absolutely without appeal over the greater part of our country?"

There was another instance of similar character presented to the committee. In this case the complainant was a large manufacturing concern with over a million dollars invested, who tried to "deal directly with the railroads," too. This manufacturer gets out a sectional bookcase. This case is capable of compact crating in small pieces. It was entitled, seemingly, to a lower classification than the common bookcase, which is big, clumsy, and occupies much space in proportion to its weight. The roads refused to allow any reduction from the regular classification that had applied to bookcases for a quarter century—namely, one and one-half times first class. In view of the argument that the making of rates should be left with the roads in the interest of facility of business between shipper and carrier—that changes may be promptly made to meet changing conditions, etc.—it seemed to this manufacturer that he would do well to persist. So he tried to see the chairman of the "Official Classification Committee." He said, "I assure you he was harder to get at than the Czar of Russia. A shipper stood just as good a chance of interviewing that man as he would to interview the Czar of Russia."

Still another illustration of this point is the case of Mr. Cabot, who testified before the committee. Mr. Gregory S. Cabot, the largest manufacturer in the United States of carbon black (dry color for printing ink), testified that while the market value of his product had gone down from 60 cents to 4 cents per pound, its classification by the railroad companies had been advanced and the cost of transportation thereby increased, and this in spite of the fact that the method of packing had been so changed that it is possible to carry practically twice as many pounds per carload.

"In less than carload, the classification was in the beginning first class; in 1887 it was advanced to one an one-half times first class. In carloads, 1887, the classification was sixth class, same as other forms of dry paint; in 1889 it was advanced to third class and maintained until January, 1905, when it was raised to second class, rule 25, or an advance of about 10 per cent. And all this time there was a constantly and rapidly increasing quantity of traffic in this commodity."

Discriminations against live stock.—One of the most far-reaching and damaging discriminations brought to the attention of Congress in these hearings was the discrimination against live stock and in favor of packing-house products and dressed meat. Live stock furnished about 12 per cent of the entire traffic of the Western roads. The rates on live stock vitally affect the entire agriculture of all this Western country, from the breeding country in the south to the feeding country in the north. Every man that grows stock, or that grows crops to be fed to stock, is interested in this matter. In all this country the freight rate to the central market is taken out of the pocket of the producer and the grower. The live stock to the market is the property of the farmer and the ranchman; he pays the freight, or, if he sells locally, it is taken out of his price. Packing-house products and fresh meats are the property of the beef trust.

Uniformly throughout the country there is an unwarrantable discrimination against live stock as compared with these trust products. At the same time, the trust product is the more expensive of transportation. From St. Paul to Chicago the proportional rate on dressed meat was cited by a representative of the Chicago Live Stock Exchange as 13½ cents per 100 pounds, while the rate on live stock was just twice as high.

Judge Cowan, representing the Texas Cattle Raisers' Association, cited a case brought by the Chicago Live Stock Exchange "before the Commission, involving the right of the railroads to charge the shippers a higher or greater rate for the transportation of cattle than they charge the packing houses on the Missouri River for a longer distance. That case was decided a few days ago, and it was held that such a discrimination was unjust and unlawful and that the shippers are entitled to a rate of 18½ cents per 100 pounds for the shipment of cattle to Chicago if the packers are entitled to 18½ cents per 100 pounds for the dressed product. The decision was manifestly just and ought to be enforced."

The beef trust, which could stand a fair rate, is favored; the grower and feeder, whose business yields a small profit, sometimes a loss, and is at best always precarious, must stand the high rate, the extortion. Mr. Fifer, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, calling attention to the importance of just rates to consumers and producers before the Senate committee, declared:

"You take a man on the plains of the West—a cattle raiser who has a thousand head of cattle; he markets them in Chicago or New York; the rate may be ever so high. Perhaps a million human beings eat that beef, and the excessive rate is divided up to that extent. A load under which a single man will stagger two will carry with ease and ten will not feel it at all.

"But how is it with the producer who has the thousand head of cattle? All he has in the world is perhaps invested in his herd, and it is a matter of the most vital importance whether he pays 50 cents a hundred or whether it is 5 cents higher, making 55 cents a hundred. He is the man that feels the excessive rate."

Discriminations against grain and American milling.—Still worse, if possible, than this discrimination against live stock is the discrimination against grain, particularly against wheat for domestic consumption, as against the shipments of the same commodities for export to foreign countries. It is answered by the railroad that this discrimination opens the foreign market to our grain. This is true, but the same market would take our grain as finished product in the form of meal and flour if the preference were shown these commodities instead. But the purpose of this discrimination is not benevolent. So the direct opposite condition prevails in this respect, and flour receives an adverse rather than a favorable discrimination.

The purpose of these discriminations is to force our wheat and grain into foreign hoppers to be ground in order to give the grain-elevator trust complete control of our cereal crops from the field to the consumer abroad. This is a railroad-made trust. Through elevator concessions and other forms of railroad favoritism it has come about that one elevator company has a monopoly of the grain business on each line of railroad. As the several lines of railroad are built together by joint ownerships, "communities of interest," etc., these several elevator companies are built together and directed with a perfect comity and accord of business policy. There is practically no competition among them. They constitute, outside of the milling industry, in effect, one purchaser of the great cereal crops of the country.

The milling business is one of the leading industries of the country. It has developed a capacity probably twice our entire wheat crop. It is distributed over thirty-three States. Neither its ownership nor control are as yet centralized to any important degree affecting competition. The mill market is a really competitive market for the producer of American cereals. This milling industry is therefore a thorn in the side of the grain-elevator trust, and is marked for destruction by the railroads. It is deliberately proposed to ruin a large portion of this great industry through systematic discrimination. A reduction in the milling capacity of the country such as is contemplated will give the grain trust absolute power to fix the price on our surplus cereal products.

From the statement before the House committee by F. H. Madgeburg, representing the Millers' National Association, I quote the following as showing the effectiveness of these discriminations:

"In 1900 the aggregate flour exported was 96 per cent of the entire export of wheat, while in 1901 (after the discriminations were established favoring wheat) it had dropped from 96 per cent to 55 per cent, owing to the discrimination practiced."

Mr. B. O. Eckart, a Chicago miller, representing the Board of Trade and the Illinois Manufacturers' Association, declared before the committee:

"That it is unfair and unjust to a great industry of this country to compel us to pay a tariff rate of 17½ cents a hundred on flour from Chicago, for instance (i. e., to New York), and at the same time to carry wheat on a secret cut rate of 8 or 10 cents per 100 pounds. It practically means confiscation of so much milling property."

Mr. E. P. Bacon testified that wheat from Missouri River points was carried to New York for export in competition with the Gulf ports at a rate of 13 cents per 100 pounds, "and the bill of lading in stating that rate had indorsed upon it a statement that if used for domestic consumption at New York" the rate should be 25½ cents per 100 pounds, or practically twice the export rate.

Because of the discrimination in favor of grain shipped for export, because similar advantages are not given to flour shipped for export, because such flour is not given the benefit of milling in transit rates the milling industry of this country is not permitted to compete in foreign markets upon the same footing as the grain trust.

The significant feature of this discrimination is that its object is to build up and perfect a monopoly.

The purpose of this monopoly is to control the market of the cereal produce of the American farmer, and when it is perfected the growers of grain will be in substantially the same position as the producer of crude petroleum in Pennsylvania.

DISCRIMINATIONS AGAINST PERSONS.

It was asserted by the railroad, and accepted by the Interstate Commerce Commission, that under the operation of the Elkins law the practice of giving rebates to favored shippers was for the most part discontinued. The railroad company is no longer dividing its income to any considerable extent with any of its patrons through the direct rebate. The railroad representatives profess to be glad of this. If true, it certainly would save the roads much money, and it would probably also operate to greatly increase indirectly the amount of the transportation taxed upon the people, paid in the price of supplies and manufactured articles.

But still there are favored shippers who through various occult influences maintain with the railroads friendly relations which enable them to obtain special concession and favors which give them very material business advantages as against their competitors not similarly favored. Every great industrial trust is inseparably bound up through the "community of interest" with one or more of the great railroad groups of the country. The comity of business policy and relations existing among these railroad groups is such that a trust is a privileged shipper on practically every railroad in the United States.

Discriminations in tariffs.—These discriminations take various forms. Sometimes they appear as discriminations in the published tariff rates. It is set up by the railroad attorneys before the United States court that the only test of the lawfulness of a rate is the fact that it is published; and the court sustains their case.

In competition with such favored shippers a small business has little chance. The roads refuse to consider the complaint, in some instances even failing to accord a courteous hearing of the complaint.

There appeared before the committee of the Senate a manufacturer of Milwaukee, who was making hardware specialties, among them springs and axles for children's vehicles. He said his principal competitors were at Toledo and Pittsburg. He had to get his raw material from Pittsburg at a rate of 18½ cents per 100 pounds. He was seeking to build up a market at St. Paul and Minneapolis. From Milwaukee to the twin cities, 335 miles, the witness testified that his rate on axles and springs was 40 cents per 100 pounds. His Toledo competitor reached the same market, a distance of 600 miles, for a rate of 37 cents on axles and 42 cents on springs; and the Pittsburg competitor, 800 miles away, at 37 cents on axles and 48 cents on springs. The combination of rates on the raw material to Milwaukee plus the rate on finished product effected a discrimination such as to practically exclude the Milwaukee manufacturer from competition in that market. "As a result," he said, "we must see business that belongs to us go to competitors several hundred miles farther away from this district than we are, or give up a large profit to hold the trade."

"Subterfuges" for rebates—"Concessions."—Attention is directed to the testimony before the Senate committee, on April 29, 1905, of Mr. James H. Hiland, third vice-president of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company, relating to the giving of rebates:

"Senator CULLOM (of the committee). Is there any subterfuge that enables them (the railroads) to give a rebate without making it a rebate?

"Mr. HILAND. There are subterfuges that can be adopted and made the means and channels for concessions in rates. They are not rebates.

"Senator CULLOM. Are they means of concessions that ought not to be granted under the law? Are the railroads, in other words, living up to the law?

"Mr. HILAND. I would like to answer that, Senator, by saying they are concessions. Whether they are lawful concessions or not I do not know."

There are "concessions" and there are "subterfuges" through which certain shippers are favored. Whether they are in violation of law, Mr. Hiland, third vice-president, in charge of traffic of one of the greatest railroad systems in the country, had not found out from his legal department. It should not require recourse to the legal department for Mr. Hiland to know that these "concessions" and "subterfuges," if not rebates in a technical sense are precisely to the same effect, and in fact are practices which the law was framed to prevent. It is not a question of the name, but of the thing itself. And these subterfuges are the same, and in fact are the things which the act of Government has stamped as pernicious and made punishable as a criminal offense.

Some illustrations of the nature of these "subterfuges" and "concessions" I take from the testimony given by Mr. C. W. Robinson, a lumber manufacturer, who came before the committee on behalf of the New Orleans Board of Trade and the Central Yellow Pine Association:

Rebates through purchasing agents.—Railroads use large quantities of lumber and timber for building and construction purposes. In fact, the railroad companies are about the largest purchasers by contract of such material that ever enter the market. "Very generally," says Mr. Robinson, "purchasing agents have been instructed to buy supplies from parties who are large shippers over their respective lines, and there is a great possibility of the direct rebate being given through the office of the purchasing agent." It may be added that there are many other lines of supply, of which the roads are extensive buyers, such as iron and steel, coal, and lubricating oils. Most of the latter is said to be purchased of the Standard Oil Company.

Switching charges.—Another one of these "subterfuges" which is very fruitful of special advantage to large shippers, particularly at competitive points, is "the absorption of switching charges at terminal points on shipments which originate at competitive points, and the refusal to absorb switching charges where the shipment originates at noncompetitive points."

The following is an instance of this practice cited by Mr. Robinson in the lumbering business:

"At Cincinnati there is a large buyer of lumber whose yard is on 'Hazen's switch.' Said switch is located on the Cincinnati, Lebanon and Northern Railway, and to reach such switch from the tracks of the Louisville and Nashville road cars must pass over the Eggleston Avenue track of Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis Railway, and thence over the Cincinnati, Lebanon and Northern Railway. These roads charge the Louisville and Nashville $6.50 to $9 per car for switching, and on lumber which originates at noncompetitive points, on the Louisville and Nashville Railway, the producer must pay this switching in addition to the regular published tariff rates; but if the lumber originates at a competitive point, then the Louisville and Nashville pays this switching charge and by so much depletes its tariff rate."

"The midnight tariff."—A commonly practiced method of discrimination between persons, particularly in the lumber business, is the promulgation of special, or what are sometimes called "midnight tariffs." Mr. Robinson cites the following as an example in his knowledge. To quote Mr. Robinson: "Early in the year 1905 the Southside Elevated road, of Chicago, was in the market for about 400 carloads of sawed and planed cross-ties, and bidders are asked to name a price f. o. b. Chicago.

"The blanket rate on ties and lumber (and such ties are nothing but one kind of lumber) from the entire yellow-pine belt to Chicago is 26 cents per 100 pounds. A number of bids were submitted to the Southside Elevated road, and, so far as I can learn, all the bids were rejected as being too high. Effective March 22, 1905, the Illinois Central Railroad issued its tariff, D-12013, I. C. C. No. 3153, in which tariff a rate of 26 cents per tie is named on yellow-pine ties to Chicago from (points) Luzon, La., to Pearl, Miss. (a distance of about 100 miles). The tariff contains a provision reading 'cars must be loaded to the full loading capacity, but not in excess of 10 per cent beyond their market-weight capacity. Ties to be billed at 165 pounds per tie.' On April 6 the Illinois Central promulgated another tariff (C-12013, I. C. C. No. 3171), canceling the previous tariff. The new tariff named the same rate per tie, the only difference being that the weight is given as 130 pounds per tie, instead of 165 pounds. Assuming that the weight per tie, as given in the last tariff, is correct, this makes a cut from the regular tariff on lumber of 6 cents per 100 pounds, or reduces the lumber rate from 26 cents per 100 pounds to 20 cents per 100 pounds on this particular class of lumber and on this particular piece of road."

Any manufacturer located on this particular piece of road who had been favored by the Illinois Central Railroad (and the presumption is warranted that there were such) with advanced information of the cut rate which would prevail during this comparatively short time would, of course, be in a position to underbid competitors and furnish the material. After shipment was made under this contract the rate went back to where it stood before. There have been instances of this kind cited in which the cut rate remained in effect not longer than a week. Some of the lumber of the favored shippers was loaded ready for shipment when the tariff issued.

Abuse of "rebilling rate" (from Mr. Robinson's testimony).—"Another abuse is what is known as the 'rebilling rate.' By rebilling rate is meant a rate by which goods received in unbroken carload lots over one railway can be rebilled over the same or another line, completing one continuous trip of the same commodity, simply changing the consignee and altering the destination of the identical shipment, without unloading or handling of freight. Such rates or privileges are greatly abused, and are the source of a great amount of indirect rebating. To illustrate—and I must ask you to pardon the use of a fictitious road, but which really and truly represents several roads—on the St. Louis and Cartersville road, not many miles out of St. Louis, is the town of Hawkinsville, Ill., which town has a population of about 1,000 people. The blanket rate on yellow-pine lumber to Hawkinsville from all points in the yellow-pine belt is 24 cents per 100 pounds.

"To St. Louis, Mo., the blanket rate is 20 cents per 100 pounds, but on lumber consigned to Hawkinsville the roads south of the Mississippi River are allowed 18 cents of the through rates, the St. Louis and Cartersville road receiving the remaining 6 cents of the through rate. At Hawkinsville there is no agent of the car-service association. By a secret understanding between the St. Louis and Cartersville road and certain favored shippers, cars may be held at Hawkinsville, for, say, fifteen days without any car service accruing, and then be billed or reshipped to any point in the central traffic association territory, and the name of the consignee changed. Let us assume that lumber shipped to Hawkinsville is rebilled to Johnsonville, in the extreme northern part of Ohio, the through rate to Johnsonville from the yellow-pine belt being 31 cents. The St. Louis and Cartersville road, with its connecting lines, gets 12 cents per 100 pounds from St. Louis to Johnsonville, the result being that the through rate is reduced from 31 to 30 cents, and no car-service charges to follow. Hundreds of carloads of lumber are shipped to Hawkinsville yearly, only to be rebilled as outlined, and in the States of Illinois and Ohio there are other points at which the same practice is in full force."

Abuse of "milling in transit."—Another form of special favor to shippers cited by Mr. Robinson is the abuse allowed by the railroads to be made by certain shippers of the so-called "milling in transit rates." Some roads make to some manufacturers of lumber, for example, a special rate, which comprehends the transportation of logs to the mill before manufacture and of lumber from the mill to market after manufacture. This device opens wide the door for favoritism and discriminations.

"Tap-line allowances."—A reduction in the rate called a "tap-line allowance" is made to lumber manufacturers having logging roads, the amount conditioned upon the length of the logging road, the amount of traffic, and any other condition which the railroad choses to consider. The conditions being different in each case, the opportunity is afforded in practice to make what amounts to a special rate to each manufacturer. The manufacturer who has the greatest commercial power secures the largest concession.

Mr. Robinson describes this form of discrimination, as follows: "For a number of years all the roads in the yellow-pine region west of the Mississippi River have given to sawmills operating on their lines and having logging roads an allowance of from 2 to 4 cents per 100 pounds of through rate; roads east of the Mississippi River, with the exception of the Mobile and Ohio Railroad, have declined to make to mills on their lines any allowance whatever, or allow them any participation in the through rate, notwithstanding that some of the mills in Mississippi have logging roads 30 to 40 miles in length. This practice is unfair and gives to the manufacturer of yellow-pine lumber enjoying such a participation in the through rate an advantage of from 60 cents to $1.80 per thousand B. M. in freight allowance."

At these hearings Mr. Gardner, a lumber manufacturer of Laurel, Miss., also testified that manufacturers east of the Mississippi were discriminated against as compared with manufacturers west of the river by an allowance called a "tap-line allowance," which was universally granted west of the river to manufacturers having logging roads on which traffic originated, but which was not granted to manufacturers east of the Mississippi. This discrimination amounted to from 2 to 6 cents per 100 pounds, or 60 cents to $1.80 per 1,000 feet of lumber. Mr. Gardner estimated that 50 per cent of the southern pine in five States west of the Mississippi moved at less than tariff rates because of these allowances. Further, he declared "that the methods of making rates down there through the South have a tendency to consolidate interests and make unreasonable rates and to make practically what are discriminations by allowances to originating roads. Some of them get as high as 6 cents out of a 16-cent rate, where the mill and the road are the same thing."

Underbilling.—A form of indirect rebate is what is known as underbilling. A shipment is carried by the railroad for a favored shipper, and when the waybill and expense bill are made out the weight of the shipment is put down as several hundred, or possibly several thousand, pounds less than the actual weight. The favored shipper gets free the amount of transportation represented by the difference betwen the actual and the "billed" weight. It is evident that a published tariff is no protection for any shipper from a discrimination of this sort.

A shipper, testifying before the Senate committee of facts within his own experience and knowledge, said: "A railroad company may publish rates, but there are ways of getting around those rates. For instance, a car is misrepresented—that is, the contents of it is—and I have asked the Interstate Commerce Commission to say that a railroad company should know what it is doing. A railroad man a little while ago told me that these goods were not billed right. Now, he therefore put the shipper in this position: That if the shipper is going to determine what he is going to pay he is going to deliver the car accordingly, and the railroads in many cases in the country don't know what goes into a car and don't know what goes out. I know of a point where 150 cases of strawberries was systematically loaded on a car upon which there was never any freight paid, and the rate was 21½ cents a crate. * * * It is done to-day."

The industrial railroad.—The industrial railroad is another loophole for the payment of indirect rebates. There is a switch, or possibly a spur track, quarter of a mile in length, running into the yards or works of a manufactory, mine, or jobbing warehouse. A paper railroad is organized by the industrial concern—a company to own this "railroad." Then this "railroad," which is really only a switch, becomes the "terminal road" for all traffic received at this plant and the "originating road" for all traffic shipped out. It is entitled to a division of the tariff rate on this traffic, a "proportional," as it is called. This proportional is big to the favored concern and small or nothing to the little one. It is in proportion to the "pull" or the bargaining power of the shipping concern. Every great industrial trust has a full complement of such "railroads."

There was a case of this kind before the Interstate Commerce Commission brought, I believe, by the independent salt mills at Atchison, Kans., involving gross discriminations in favor of the salt trust. The trust received from the railroad, according to Mr. Davies, about 35 per cent of the tariff rate on shipments merely for the use of a switch at the trust plant. The evidence in this case has been with the department of justice a year or two and nothing has been done. Presumably nothing can be done under the law. Mr. Davies, of Chicago, gives this illustration:

"In Chicago there is an Iroquois coal company. That coal company has its rate. They transport coke from Pennsylvania or West Virginia to that point. I think the distance is over 600 miles. The freight rate on that kind of coke is $2.60 per ton, and they deliver to the switch in Chicago on what they call 'Chicago Short Line,' and it is a very short line, because it is nothing more than a switch, into the Iroquois Iron Company's yards, and they pay that Iroquois Iron Company no less than 40 cents a ton."

Demurrage charge.—Similar to the absorption of switching charges, as already explained, is the discrimination in the charges for demurrage, so called. On all carload shipments there is a time limit set by the railroad companies, or through the organizations of the several railroads, known as "car-service associations," on the detention of cars at points for loading or unloading. A fixed per-diem charge is made for any such detention over twenty-four or forty-eight hours—that is, it is made to most shippers. For favored shippers this demurrage charge may be absorbed and nobody except the party to the transaction be the wiser. "In other words," to quote from the testimony, "in fixing the charges it is not the commodities that are shipped on the American railroads to-day that determine what the service is worth; it is the chromo of the shipper."

Organized industry favored.—Because of the "community of interest" existing among the "big business" enterprises of the country and the railroads of the country—because of the mutual graft, if you please—it is a settled policy of the roads to favor organized industry in almost every point. Said Mr. Davies in his testimony, "If you will organize a big trust and go to a railroad company and tell them that it is organized in that way, you can get 30 per cent reduction from the fact that you are organized." Being challenged to cite an example of this discrimination in his own knowledge and experience, he replied: "To my knowledge I paid more for the transportation of a carload of strawberries from Tennessee (to Chicago) than the through rates on the packing-house products from Kansas City to Liverpool, England. The rate to-day on bananas imported by way of New Orleans or Mobile gateway is 47 cents per 100 pounds, with an 18,000-pound minimum, as against the transportation of strawberries on the basis of 20,000-pound minimum at 51 cents, and that rate involves 15 cents per 100 pounds for icing, and there is a messenger carried on the banana train that is not carried on the other."

Interstate Commerce Commissioner Prouty appeared before the Senate committee. He declared that, in his judgment, the most serious form of discrimination that the country would have to contend with in the future is this discrimination as it appears in the open published tariff rates, and he cited the favoritism of the Standard Oil Trust. He declared, "You go out in New England to-day and you will find the 'freight' tariff put absolutely into the possession of the Standard Oil Company, every foot of the territory of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad. You will find that class of discrimination all through this country. I think in the future that class of discrimination will probably be more serious than the question of rebates. That is really not a discrimination against localities. That is discrimination as between shippers. That is the adjustment of a tariff in such a way as to prefer one shipper to another."

On this subject Mr. Joseph Bartells, of St. Paul, a jobber of independent oil, cited the following discriminations with which he found it necessary to contend in his business in Minnesota. He said that the rates on oil had been raised by the railroads at the solicitation of the Standard Oil Company from 17½ to 19½ cents per 100 pounds between Pennsylvania and Chicago, and from 15 to 20 cents per 100 pounds between Chicago and St. Paul. This makes the total through rate for the independent product to St. Paul 29½ cents. The independent dealers are obliged to make their prices based on the freight rate. The Standard pipes its oil to Chicago, and also enjoys special concessions on freight shipments. It can therefore make its prices independently of the published freight tariff. For example, Mr. Bartells cited the Standard Oil prices in the middle of last April as 8 cents per gallon at St. Paul and 12 cents per gallon at Fergus Falls, Minn., while the difference in rate was only 1½ cents per gallon.

ENORMOUS ADVANCES IN FREIGHT RATES.

Since January, 1900, freight rates have taken great jumps. Directly or indirectly the entire industrial field has been affected. One result is that the people of the country are now paying annually about $200,000,000 (I. C. C. estimate $155,000,000, 1903) more per year for transportation service than they would pay were the old rates still in force. These advances are in force in every section of the country. They are in force on nearly every important article of freight shipment. Many of them were put in force through advance in classification of commodities for shipment. Of the three classifications covering the merchandise traffic of the country one shows 572 commodities so advanced, another 531, and the third, 240. In addition to these advances there were very great advances on several most important articles of shipment in commodity rates, such as iron and steel, soft coal, and lumber. Besides these the public burden has been increased by the greatly increased cost of transportation by private car and freight line companies.

Advance in rates on hay.—Among the most conspicuous and important commoditites directly affected by these advances in the classification of freights is hay. Mr. John B. Daish, representing the National Hay Association, stated before your committee that the trunk line railroads had carried hay and straw from the West to Eastern markets as sixth-class freight for thirteen years. The rate under this classification from Chicago to New York, for instance, was 25 cents per 100 pounds. With the advance of January, 1900, hay went to the fifth-class, rate, Chicago to New York, 30 cents per 100 pounds. At the same time grain was being carried to New York at 15 to 17½ cents.

These advances in the transportation of rates on hay, being made in the form of a classification, necessarily affected all shipments within the "Official Classification" territory. Mr. English, a dealer in hay for many years, submitted statistics showing that nearly one-half of the hay crop of the country was produced in Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Nebraska, and South Dakota. He said, "I think in the last two years (i. e., since the advance) not one ton of that hay has come East * * * to the seaboard markets. Taking this hay from the sixth class and putting it in the fifth class increases the freight on hay from $1 to $2.60 per ton, according to the distance of haul and the location Prior to that we in Baltimore frequently brought hay from west of the Ohio River. We shipped hay from Ohio and Illinois and Wisconsin and all the Western States. I have been in the hay business for well on to twenty years, and prior to this time we considered Illinois and eastern Iowa our best source of supply, but in the last two years (i. e., since the advance) I have not handled a carload of hay from Illinois and very little from Indiana."

In effect, this advance in the classification of hay has practically excluded the hay crop of the North Central States from the Eastern markets.

In April, 1904, the Interstate Commerce Commission, in compliance with the resolution of the Senate, presented a memorandum showing the effect of these advances in increased freight charges to the public. The advances were found to range from 40 cents to $1.50 per ton, and were estimated to average 80 cents per ton. The estimated shipments affected were 3,420,980 tons yearly, and the advance was placed at $2,434,000 annually. The total amount of this advance to the date of the report was placed at $10,000,000.

Advance in rates on sugar.—Another one of these advances in classification was sugar, which was likewise advanced from the sixth to the fifth class. And the people of the United States have paid out on this advance to date something over $5,600,000.

Advances in rates on live stock.—The most vigorous complaint before the Congressional committees against advances and overcharges in freight rates was that which was made by the live-stock interests. These excessive rates for the transportation of live stock vitally affect the prosperity of the whole agricultural West. The agriculture of nearly all of this whole section derives the largest part of its money income from the sale of live stock. Live stock is the most valuable, single, finished product of this great industry. It constitutes about 12 per cent of the total tonnage of the traffic of the western railroads. It is probably largely because of its great importance that the railroads have steadily advanced the charges for hauling and handling this traffic. Even a slight percentage of advance in the rates on traffic of so great volume and so high class would obviously yield an enormous increase of revenue to the carriers.

Most conspicuous among the complainants against these advances and overcharges was the Cattle Raisers' Association of Texas, represented by Judge Sam H. Cowan, of that State. The advances complained of by the cattle raisers of the Southwest affect almost equally all live-stock regions. The rates most complained of are those on which cattle are shipped from breeding grounds of the Southwest to feeding grounds in the Northwest. It is this character of overcharges that have bankrupted the stock-feeding industry of Iowa and other Western States. So extensive is this specialization by localities in the breeding and feeding branches of this industry become that any oppression of this traffic must necessarily operate most injuriously through the whole live-stock industry. Said Judge Cowan in his testimony, "That is an extensive business, and there have been some 400,000 head of cattle shipped that way in the last two or three years. When we had the trail and the cattle were driven the railroads thought it profitable to transport them at $55 per car. But the settlement of the country and the closing of the trail destroyed that competition, and so from time to time the railroads have advanced the freight rates, so that to-day the rate is $100 per car, for which they were glad at one time to accept $70 per car, and are even undertaking to pay rebates to get business."

Judge Cowan further declared that the advances in rates on this class of traffic alone amounts to not less than $3,000,000 annually.

The importance and character of the "cattle raisers' " complaints are best appreciated from an examination of their complaint submitted in the case brought by them before the Interstate Commerce Commission, a copy of which complaint is put in by Judge Cowan as part of his statement before the Senate Committee. The following important statements are made, the proof of which the Cattle Raisers' Association has laid before the Interstate Commerce Commission:

The Cattle Raisers' Association, of Texas, embraces about 1,500 members, engaged in all branches of the cattle business, principally in the States of Texas, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Arizona, and Indian Territory, and the States of Colorado and Kansas, and, to some extent, in Nebraska, Wyoming, South Dakota, and the Republic of Mexico. The membership of this association owns approximately 4,000,000 cattle in these States and Territories.

The principal markets named are Kansas City, St. Joseph, South Omaha, St. Louis, Chicago, Fort Worth, New Orleans, Denver, and Pueblo, Colo. Many shipments are made from the Southwest to the Northwest for grazing and feeding purposes.

The complaint charges that "all of the interstate rates applicable to all interstate shipments of cattle and other live stock from all points in said States and Territories are unjust, unreasonable, and unlawful," and that the rates put in force in 1899 and subsequently were "likewise unjust and unreasonable," and, as instancing the advances in freight rates on beef cattle in the preceding five years, the complainant submitted a statement of representative rates showing such advances from 1898 to 1903. From this statement it appears that from ten important shipping points representing Texas, Oklahoma Territory, and Indian Territory the rates to Chicago, St. Louis, and Kansas City markets had been advanced during this period in amounts ranging from 4¼ to 9½ cents per 100 pounds, or from 12 to 31 per cent.

The complaint further avers that the roads conspired and confederated to bring about these advances, charging that on February 1, 1899, a joint arrangement was made among them whereby the rates on beef cattle from all southwestern points to markets were advanced about 2½ cents per 100 pounds. It further charges that in like manner about December 15, 1899, the rates from all Texas, Indian Territory, and Oklahoma Territory and New Mexico were advanced about 3 cents per 100 pounds, and the rates from other points were advanced in like manner and for amounts not stated. Other advances have also been subsequently made, particularly about March, 1903, there was another advance of 3 cents per 100 pounds, making the cattle rates which have been maintained.

The complaint goes on to state that the rates in 1898, before the advances were substantially what they had averaged for the preceding ten years, and the increases which made the rates higher than for fifteen years were unwarranted. It is further offered that these interstate rates are from 20 to 30 per cent higher than the local rates within States where the rates are regulated by law. The following examples are cited:

Texas local rates, beef cattle or calves, 500–550 miles, 26½ cents per 100 pounds; 650–700 miles, 30 cents per 100 pounds.

Interstate rates, beef cattle and calves, Fort Worth and north Texas points to Kansas City, 500–550 miles, 36½ cents per 100 pounds.

North Texas points to St. Louis, 600–700 miles, 42½ cents per 100 pounds.

"And by the local distance tariff of the States of Illinois and Iowa, rates on cattle and other live stock are proportionally still lower than those of Texas, while local rates in Kansas, Missouri, and Nebraska are not substantially higher than local rates for similar distances in Texas."

The complaint also states that, in addition to these advances, the roads have ceased to grant free return passage for shippers to go with and care for their live stock in transit, but require the payment of the regular fare for the return passage.

The advances are not justified by advances in the value or price of live stock, "as is well known to the defendants, and are of less value on the markets to-day than at any time in many years, and the burdens of excessive rates of freight to-day bear more heavily upon the producers of cattle than at any time in the past, so that upon shipments from southwestern Texas, western Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona, the rates of freight to the markets, upon ordinary range cattle, which are the kind produced and shipped, take from 30 to 50 per cent of their value."

The complaint further declares that the advances are not justified by any improvements in the character of the service. "As to this, complainant says that the service has not improved; that cattle trains, as a rule, are not run at any greater speed; and, in fact, as complainant believes, the service is poorer than it was ten years ago, both in the manner of handling cattle and other live-stock shipments and in the time consumed in their transportation, and is therefore less valuable than it was ten years ago."

Attention of the Commission was called to the $2 terminal charge at Chicago, "imposed, charged, and collected, since June 1, 1894," by all roads entering Chicago. "Complainant avers and charges that the same was and is an unreasonable exaction added to and collected in addition to said unreasonable transportation charges, and that the service for which it purports to have been imposed, viz, for delivery to the Union Stock Yards at Chicago, was and is comprehended in the through rate.

"Complainant says that said through rate to Chicago at all times comprehended the service of transportation of live stock to said Union Stock Yards upon the Chicago rate from all points in said States and Territories, and that the same was at all times sufficiently high to afford a reasonable compensation for such transportation from points in such States and Territories to the Union Stock Yards at Chicago, including the delivery there of such live stock. That such terminal charge is therefore unjust and unreasonable, and in violation of section 1 of the act to regulate commerce. Complainants further show that no such charge is made at any of the other markets, and that under the circumstances the imposition of such charges at Chicago constitutes an undue and unreasonable prejudice and disadvantage to shippers who ship, or desire to ship, to said market, and is therefore in violation of section 3 of the act to regulate commerce."

In addition it is charged that the roads exact additional payments for the feeding of cattle on trains and that the charges so exacted are 50 per cent more than the value of such feed.

As evidence of the correctness of these statements regarding the advances in the rates, Judge Cowan submitted part of the testimony of Mr. Haile, freight traffic manager of the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railway Company, in the hearing had before the Interstate Commerce Commission:

"Mr. COWAN. There has been a general complaint of an advance in rates, has there not?

"Mr. HAILE. Yes, sir; there has been complaint."

* * * * * * *

"Mr. COWAN. The advances which were made in those rates made them higher than they had ever been before?

"Mr. HAILE. I think they are.

"Mr. COWAN. Is it not a fact that for ten years previous to the advances made in 1899 the rate from Fort Worth, for example, which would be a fair one, had never been more than 31½ cents per 100 pounds?

"Mr. HAILE. I will tell you. I think that is substantially true, Mr. Cowan."

* * * * * * *

"I find that such rate was, in 1889, to Kansas City, 28½ cents, and it was advanced from that figure up to 33 cents, where it remained for a series of years, and was reduced again to 28 cents, and then advanced to 33½ cents, and then again to 36½ cents.

"Mr. COWAN. The 36½-cent rate to-day is a higher rate than has existed since the organization of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and since we have had a file of the tariffs with them?

"Mr. HAILE. Yes, sir.

"Mr. COWAN. What else could you expect, then, than that the cattlemen would complain of the advances in these rates?

"Mr. HAILE. Oh, I expect them to complain."

Mr. Murdo MacKenzie, a cattle raiser, operating one of the largest ranches in the country, appeared before the committee to complain of these advances in freight rates. He testified that at one time, under conditions of active competition, the rate per car from Amarillo, Tex., and common points to northern feeding grounds had been $55. He said:

"Next year they came to us and asked if we would not agree to raise the rate to $65 per car; that if we would agree to give them $65 the rate would be satisfactory to us, and that it would be perfectly satisfactory to them. That was a paying rate. * * * That was in 1890, if I remember well. This state of affairs continued up until 1898. In 1899 they increased our rate, and from year to year continued increasing our rate, until to-day we are paying them $100."

With reference to the deterioration in the service obtained, Mr. MacKenzie testified that it is necessary to unload cattle to feed more times in transit, because of the slower rate of travel, which is only ten to twelve miles per hour. The cattlemen ask that the rate be eighteen to twenty miles per hour. They say that such rate of speed is necessary to the welfare of their business, and it is certainly not excessive.

In this connection Mr. MacKenzie testified before the committee of the House, "Up to 1897 I could go to a railroad company and tell them that I would give them from ten to twelve cars on a train and they would give me a special train. But now they will not move any freight unless they get the full tonnage of a train—the full tonnage that the engine is rated to carry. In many instances they overrate their engines, so that they will not make more than seven to ten miles an hour. I have had shipments on the road—I have had from 3,000 to 5,000 cattle on the road—and I have got a service of from seven to ten miles per hour.

"Now, gentlemen, it would be impossible for me to tell you or explain to you the losses we entail unless you are cattlemen; in fact, I do not know about it myself * * * I do not know how these things are arrived at, but I know the loss to us is enormous."

The loss in the shrinkage of cattle on account of say 24 hours' delay is 25 pounds to 40 pounds per head. Mr. MacKenzie said, "I take it at 25 pounds, and deduct that from the weight of a steer that will sell for $4.50 per hundred, and you will see that we lose a little over $1 a head on every steer we ship to market. * * * Now, gentlemen, when you think of it, you may suppose that 25 pounds is a very small thing in the weight of a steer, and that it don't make any difference. But here is a poor little devil who has been working hard all the year feeding his cattle with high-priced corn, and with the poor price of cattle on the market he must lose $1 per head. What show has he got to go into the courts to make the railroads pay for this? He has none; and even if he does succeed it takes him years to get it, and costs him more than the whole thing is worth."

Mr. MacKenzie testified that the rates for shipment of cattle to market had been increased also by changing from a rate per carload to a rate per 100 pounds. This did not appear directly from the tariffs, but was none the less burdensome in fact. The rate per car had been $62.50 to Kansas City. The rate was changed to 28 cents per 100 pounds, and the minimum carload weight set at 22,000 pounds. Had this weight been fair and practicable in fact there would not have been necessarily any increase in the rate. But, as a condition of the proper shipment of cattle, it is necessary to load cars to a certain limit. This means about 25,000 pounds per car on the average, and at 28 cents per 100 pounds this meant $70 per car, or an increase of $7.50 per car. But the railroad tariff officials tried to make the shippers believe that the rate had not been raised.

In 1900 the rate per 100 pounds was raised to 31½ cents, making the rate $78.75, or $8.75 higher than after the first increase, and $16.25 higher than before the carload rates were withdrawn. In 1903 the rate per 100 pounds was again advanced, this time to 34½ cents per 100 pounds, making $86.25 per carload of 25,000 pounds, or $7.50 more than had been charged since 1900, and representing a total increase per carload of steers over the carload rate in force in 1898 of $23.75, or about 38 per cent.

As instancing the unreasonableness of these advances, Mr. MacKenzie related an experience with the traffic officials. At the time when the rate from Amarillo and common points to Kansas City, 500 miles, stood at 31½ cents (before it was raised the last time to 34½ cents), the shippers went to the roads and complained, citing the rate from Las Animas, Colo., to Kansas City, 500 miles, 23½ cents per 100 pounds. The roads admitted the discrimination and, to "help" the Texas cattlemen, raised the rate from Colorado to Kansas City to 26 cents, although the Colorado rate had previously been satisfactory to them, i. e., the roads.

Another witness who came before the Senate committee to complain of the railroad oppression of the live-stock industry was Hon. W. A. Harris, formerly United States Senator from Kansas, who appeared as representative of the American Short Horn Breeder's Association, an extensive live-stock organization. Mr. Harris strongly indorsed the correctness of the sentiments and statements of Judge Cowan. He declared that the cattle rates in the Southwest had in the last five or six years been advanced 25 or 30 per cent.

Another petitioner to the committee of the Senate was the Chicago Live Stock Exchange, which handles practically all the live stock received at this, the greatest live-stock market of the world. The statement of the exchange setting forth the "terminal charge" extortion at the Union Stock Yards, in part, follows:

"For the past eleven years this exchange has been fighting for its patron's interests against the extortion by the railroad companies in the matter of the 'terminal charge' of $2 per car, which, on June 1, 1894, was added to the freight on each and every car of live stock shipped into or out of the Union Stock Yards of Chicago on western railroads. This amount was put on by the railroads to cover a charge varying from 80 cents to $1.50 per car, begun at that date by the Chicago Junction Railway Company for the use, by the various railroads, of tracks connecting the terminals of said roads with the Union Stock Yards and owned by the Junction Railway Company. A storm of indignation arose, and every shipper protested, and the Chicago Live Stock Exchange, on behalf of those shippers, at once instituted proceedings to remove the charge. The matter was brought before the Interstate Commerce Commission as the proper tribunal to give redress, and, notwithstanding the efforts of the railroads, its decisions have always been favorable to the exchange, and at least one-half of the charge was declared unjust and unreasonable. The United States Supreme Court confirmed the Commission's view. * * *

"The exchange, however, has never been able to prevent the continued collection of this charge by the railroad. The hundreds of thousands of men who have suffered for eleven years and are still suffering this extortion feel that some means should be devised for their protection. There have been over $6,000,000 taken from them under this charge without one cent of additional benefit."

ADVANCE IN RATES ON LUMBER.

In February, 1903, an advance was ordered by the roads of 2 cents per 100 pounds, or $8 per car, in all rates on Southern pine lumber, from all Southern producing points, from Georgia to Texas, inclusive, to all markets north of the Ohio River, to all points in Middle and Eastern States—to practically all markets to which this lumber is shipped. So far as the evidence shows, no justification has been offered by the roads for this advance, except that the traffic is able to bear the burden of the higher rates.

Mr. Robinson, representing the New Orleans Board of Trade, before the committee of the House told of a hearing had at Atlanta to consider complaints of the lumbermen against these advances. He said: "Mr. Culp, traffic manager of the Southern Railroad, was on the stand. He was asked to explain why this raise of the rates on lumber was made. As nearly as I can remember his exact language it was this: The railroad companies, desiring to share in the general prosperity of the country, looked around to see who could stand an advance in rates. In their judgment—mark you, in their judgment—the manufacturers of lumber in the Southern States were prosperous and could stand a raise in rates. Therefore they raised the rates."

The statement before the Senate committee by Mr. Gardner, a lumber manufacturer of Mississippi, was to the same effect. There is no competition in this traffic. The only limit recognized by the roads is what the traffic will bear. Mr. Gardner went to Mr. Harrihan, general manager of the Illinois Central Railroad, to complain of excessive rates on lumber, and Mr. Harrihan's reply to Mr. Gardner, as he quoted it to the committee, was: "You people are prospering anyway, and when times get so hard that you can not do business, then we will reduce your rate."

This advance in the rates means an average increase of 60 cents per 1,000 pounds in the price of Southern lumber in the Northern market. It affects directly all the extensive consuming territory north of the Ohio River and east of the Mississippi. It is estimated by the Interstate Commerce Commission that this advance in freight rates applies to annual shipments of lumber amounting to 20,000,000 tons. On this basis, the total amount collected annually under this advance would be about $8,000,000, and, if it is figured from the time the advance was made, 1903, to the present time, this advance probably amounts to about $25,000,000. This is what it has cost the consumers of lumber to have the roads advance these rates. This is the significance of this little 2-cent advance in the freight rates.

Aside from these excessive rates to Northern markets, Southern lumber dealers complain bitterly of the rates for local distribution of this product. On this traffic the rates are often still more exorbitant. An illustration of this situation was given by a committee representing the Missouri, Kansas, and Oklahoma Territory Association of Lumber Dealers. The illustration shows how the roads use their monopoly power to extort exorbitant rates for transportation of freight at noncompetitive or nonfavored points in the distribution of Southern lumber to consumers in Kansas and Oklahoma. In this case the shipment originates in Texas. The committee statement is as follows:

"Let us suppose a train load of lumber originates at Conroe, Tex., on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad, and let us suppose that this lumber is distributed along its line to Chicago, the distances and rates will be as follows:

	Distance.	Rate per 100 pounds.
	Miles.	Cents.
Gainesville, Tex	342	18½
Ardmore, Okla	382	25
Purcell, Okla	449	26½
Guthrie, Okla	513	28½
Wichita, Kans	653	28½
Topeka, Kans	815	28½
Lawrence, Kans	842	23
Kansas City, Mo	882	23
Chicago, Ill	1,340	24

"And all points between Carrollton, Mo., and Chicago on this line get a 24 cent rate. You will notice that the rate to Gainesville, Tex., and Ardmore, Okla., jumps up 6½ cents per 100 pounds in a distance of 40 miles, or 30¼ mills per ton per mile, whereas the through rate to Chicago is 3.6 mills per ton per mile. The rate increases in inverse ratio to the distance the lumber is carried. This is not an isolated case, but this is a fair sample of the lumber rates adopted by all the roads operating in the State of Kansas and in Oklahoma.

"Texas originates lumber within its own State, and has a stringent State railroad law. This accounts for the advance in freight as soon as the road strikes Oklahoma, and also emphasizes the necessity of an interstate railroad law. The distance from Conroe to Chicago is more than twice the distance from Conroe to Wichita, and yet the rate to Chicago is 24 cents, while the rate to Wichita, over the same road, under precisely similar conditions, is 28½ cents per 100 pounds."

ADVANCES ON SOFT COAL.

In the early part of 1903, advances in rates on soft coal were made throughout the official territory, which are estimated by the Interstate Commerce Commission, to average about 10 cents per ton. The tonnage affected is estimated to be something over 100,000,000 annually. Based on this amount, the advance of 10 cents per ton would be over $10,000,000 a year. And if this rate is maintained to the present time, the total increased charge collected would be in excess of $30,000,000 on this commodity alone.

ADVANCES ON IRON AND STEEL.

In this same memoranda the Interstate Commerce Commission state: "At the beginning of the year 1903, the rates on all iron and steel articles were advanced 10 per cent in the territories governed by official classifications. The annual reports of the carriers do not appear to include all iron and steel articles in the tables which give the separate tonnage for particular commodities." The total tonnage assigned to commodities to which this advance is applicable, however, amounts approximately to 20,000,000 tons annually. An advance of 10 per cent would equal from one-half to one and one-half cents per 100 pounds, and average probably about 1 cent per 100 pounds, or 20 cents per ton. On the basis of this tonnage the net annual increase in the freight charge because of this advance will be approximately $4,000,000.

Express companies.—The foundation of the abuse in the freight line, private car, and express company lies in the discrimination by the railroad company in favor of these institutions as against the public. This fact is well illustrated by the testimony of a Chicago shipper before the Senate committee with reference to the express companies engaged in the transportation of perishable fruit.

In the first place, the express company is not a common carrier; is not subject to the act to regulate commerce, and consequently there is no deterrent confronting it in its wrongdoing. This Chicago shipper is a representative of seventy associations of fruit growers and acts in the capacity of general consignee for these associations at Chicago. The point which he makes in this connection is that the managers of railways discriminate in favor of express companies because they have private interest therein.

The significance of this illustration, briefly stated, is this: Until recently the bulk of the Louisiana strawberry crop was brought north by express, and a very considerable portion is still so shipped. At the shipping points an official is employed by the railway company and the express company—by the railway on a salary and by the express company on a commission. The very system by which the local agents of the railroads are also constituted as agents of the express companies, but on a commission basis, is caluculated to induce them to maintain and promote the proportion of express business at the expense of freight or railroad business.

In the given illustration the cost per carload on strawberries by freight, including refrigeration, is $152 per car; time, fifty-two hours. In consequence of this slow schedule, or because of fruit being overripe or water-soaked, or because of the failure of the railroad companies to provide cars, or for other causes, it is frequently necessary that such fruits go forward by express. The cost by express—time, thirty-six hours—is $400 per car. Of this amount the railroad, which furnishes 97½ per cent of the service, receives $180. The express company, which furnishes the 2½ per cent of the service, receives $220. The shippers say that they are willing to pay 25 per cent more than the present freight—say, $190—and they should be given a thirty-six hour service, such as the railroad gives the express company for $180, and that they should not be obliged to pay the express company more than twice as much for no additional service.

This discrimination favoring the express company gives them a very great advantage as compared with the ordinary shipper. These express companies are engaged in the commission business. They find customers for much of the traffic which they handle.

As another illustration of this discrimination, Mr. Davies submits the following instance: "A friend of mine, a solicitor in the freight business, went to a house in Chicago that had four carloads ready to ship to New York. The rate was $2.25 a hundred. The railroads were religious. They would not shade the rates, and it was a good line, and expected to get the business on the merits of the service. Two days afterwards he went up there, and the express company had hauled down the cars, and they were shipped to New York and delivered to the store at the other end, including the cartage, which they own, for $1.50, and the railroad companies, I presume, got 45 per cent of the $1.50 and were satisfied."

Private car lines.—From all parts of the country where perishable fruit is grown or shipped came complaints of the oppression of the private car and refrigerator car companies. Prior to the advent of the private car line in the Michigan fruit business a charge of 79 cents per 100 pounds covered the total cost of all service, including refrigeration, for the shipment of fruit to Boston. With the advent of the private cars, $20 per carload was added as an icing charge. When Armour secured an exclusive contract on the Pere-Marquette line, this additional charge was increase to $55 per carload, except at competitive points. Not only was this charge exorbitant, but it involves resulting discrimination as between the grower, who has a choice between the Armour car and the railroad car and the shipper who must use the Armour car. This discrimination maintains at present. In May, 1905, the Michigan Central withdrew from the Armour contract with the result that discrimination is restored as between competitive and noncompetitive points in the Michigan fruit belt. Mr. Mead, representing the National League of Commission Merchants, testified with reference to this condition: "One man who can ship fruit over the Michigan Central will get a rate of $25 (for icing) to Boston. The man who uses the Pere-Marquette road (where the Armour exclusive contract prevails) will have to pay $45."

Testimony was submitted in which it was declared that the rates for transportation of peaches from Georgia to northern markets is most exorbitant. The rates were cited, and from these rates on carload shipments of 20,000 pounds of peaches the charge per ton per mile is practically three and one-fourth times the average ton-mile rate on freight in the United States. The charge of $67.50 per car for refrigeration from North Georgia to New York was designated as "enormous."

Complaint from the citrus fruit growers of California set forth that in addition to the enormous rate for refrigeration many of the cars furnished are so small that they will not carry the required minimum carload rate without great damage to the fruit. This results in a necessary underloading of the cars and a consequent much higher rate of charge than is given in the tariffs.

Growers of California deciduous fruits complain still more of the excessive charges for refrigeration. Said their representative before the Senate committee: "This icing charge is exhorbitant, averaging about $106 per car, and believed by many to be all profit for the reason that the (Armour) Company can, as it does in some instances, put up its own ice or own a controlling interest in companies that may be permitted to furnish it with ice, consequently the profits acruing to such company ultimately find their way into the treasury of the Armour Company.

It developed in the testimony before the Senate committee that the rates for refrigeration from the Sacramento Valley to eastern points range from $80 to $120 per car and averaged about $106 per car. At the same time the Northern Pacific Railroad was shipping fruit from Washington and North Pacific Coast points under a charge for icing of $25 per carload.

Mr. Joseph H. Call appeared before the Senate committee on behalf the Southern California Fruit Exchange and the citrus fruit interests of California. Mr. Call stated that evidence in the rate cases in which he participated before the Interstate Commerce Commission established that the average costs to growers per 80-pound box of putting oranges aboard car is $1.10. The freight to eastern markets under a blanket rate amounts to 90 cents per crate, with the charge for refrigeration at $70 to $80 a car. The total cost of laying the fruit down in the eastern markets is $2 to $2.10 per box, and the average selling price for the past three seasons was as follows: 1902 to 1903, $2.20; 1903–4, $1.977; 1904–5, $2.13. So high are the freight charges and refrieration charges on this traffic that the margin of profit to the growers is very narrow and the business is indeed precarious. The total freight paid annually on this traffic to railroads is about $12,000,000, and is about ten times the total estimated profits to the growers on the product so shipped.

Not only are the rates for transportation and refrigeration under the private-car system uniformly exorbitant and unreasonable, but they are charged for a service that is often inadequate and unsatisfactory. Referring to the service in the shipment of the Georgia peaches, it was declared, "As to the refrigerator car service, in spite of the enormous charge of $67.50 * * * the service was bad, peaches spoiled en route and cars could not be had at many places for loading."

Mr. Mead submitted testimony that the service was inadequate, resulting in enormous loss to fruit and berry growers; that the refrigeration was imperfect, necessitating underloading of cars and consequently an increase of about 20 per cent in the already high freight and icing charges. In case of loss or damages he declared it well-nigh impossible to fix the responsibility, and that the freight bills were not in any way itemized so that the shipper could know how much he was paying for any part of the service nor to whom he was paying it. He cited one case in which Armour & Co. sued a receiver of freight for charges on a shipment shipped in an Illinois Central car, the only apparent connection being that it was shipped at the Armour rate; and another case in which the Chicago and Eastern Illinois Railroad sued a receiver for a freight charge on an Armour service. "In one instance the railroad is suing for that work and in the other Armour is suing for the work performed by the railroad."

Mr. Mead submitted in evidence of the failure of Armour & Co. to furnish efficient service where they have exclusive contracts to furnish all the equipment to move the traffic the following letter, by a pioneer trucker of North Carolina, to the Carolina Fruit and Truckers' Journal:

WALLACE, N. C., May 5, 1905.

Editor Carolina Fruit and Truckers' Journal:

During my thirty-five years' experience in the strawberry business in this section I have never seen anything to compare with the disastrous results of the present season. In fact, it looks now like this, the most valuable strawberry crop North Carolina has ever produced, will be lost on account of poor transportation facilities. Our association has done all it could to keep the transportation people posted as to existing conditions, and told them it would take 2,500 refrigerator cars to move the crop; yet the supply of cars gave out before we had been shipping ten days. Thousands of crates of berries have rotted at the railroad stations for want of cars, and many of our growers are ruined unless the transportation people stand the loss, as they should do.

The situation is terrible. We have had no refrigerator cars left at this station to be loaded in five days. What we had came by in the "pick-up" train, and with instructions to load for New York only. They packed them mostly without slats, 7 crates wide and 4 high, running about 450 crates to the car, and are being delivered one to three days late. The markets are taking good berries at good prices. The "pick-up" berries are selling for nothing to 8 cents, as to condition.

Growers are demoralized and about frantic. Yesterday there was one empty car on the "pick-up," which was givin to one party who had bill of lading for 300 crates. As soon as the car stopped other growers began to carry their berries into it, and for some time it looked like we would have a general hand-to-hand battle, while our clever agent, who has been worried until he looks like he is just out of a spell of fever, was powerless. "Forbearance has ceased to be a virtue" here, and we must have more cars or a heavy police force, for our boys want to fight.

The "pick-up" train as now managed will not do. You can not haul heavy loads of guano and strawberries successfully on the same train. One came by here so heavily loaded with guano it had to be cut in two, and took one part to Teacheys and engine came back after the remainder. I don't know how long it takes to get to New York that way.

The railroad people make a big difference between guano and strawberries when they make up the tariff, but when they make up their trains they all go together. Of course railroad people claim that freight must be higher on berries, as they are perishable. This is all right if they bear this in mind in their movement. The berries that are being packed in the "pick-up" cars, 450 crates to the car, had better be dumped into the creek. Three box cars loaded with berries left here yesterday, which berries had been picked up and lying at the station since Monday. Some of the crates were leaking when they were loaded, but they got about 500 in a car and they will be in bad shape when they are unloaded.

J. S. WESTBROOK.

Only about 600 cars were delivered, and Mr. Mead estimated the resulting loss "at least half a million dollars." (Mr. Robbins of the Armour car lines complainingly testified that the Armour Company would probably have to pay $75,000 damages.)

The commission men complain also that Armour & Co. engaged in the buying and selling of fruits and produce, and that these exorbitant rates work a gross discrimination against all other dealers and commission men, enabling the Armour establishments to drive them out of business. The advantage of the car-line company engaged in the fruit business is described as follows: "If Mr. Armour ships to-day in his own cars his own products he has the advantage of the commission men to the extent of the return he receives plus his car rental and less the actual expense of ice." Between Michigan and Boston, for example, this would amount to probably $50 per carload on peaches.

Since September, 1904, Armour & Co. advertised and caused to be generally circulated the announcement of their withdrawal from the produce and commission business. Mr. Mead, of Boston, testified, however, that Armour & Co. continued in this business, operating under the name of a dummy corporation. As an instance in his own personal knowledge he named the J. T. Kimball Company, of Boston, a concern organized and operated by Armour clerks. Similar complaints of the undue advantage to the car line engaged in the produce and commission business come from all sections of the country.

It was stated before this committee that rebates are paid and admitted by the Santa Fe Refrigerator Line. The testimony of Mr. Leeds before the Interstate Commerce Commission was cited on this point. He declared that his company had built a new refrigerator line and entered the fruit transportation business in California. He stated that he was then, June, 1904, paying rebates, sending money by checks to the shippers of fruit. He said he had to do it to get the business, because Armour & Co. had established the practice in their business in the same territory.

Mr. C. N. Brown, an orange grower, testified: "They paid us those rebates, and every one of them would stand in line to get to talk to us—for that $35 a car—with the cash in hand, too. We did not have to wait for it."

Mr. Stevens, testifying in this connection, said: "If they (the Santa Fe Railway Company) entered into competition with the Southern Pacific, as testified by Mr. Leeds, they gave a rebate of $25 for the short haul to Chicago and $35 for the long haul. But, as would be inferred and was implied by the gentleman this morning—and I had a talk with him afterwards—it would seem that that was given in the way of a reduction in refrigeration, and as a matter of fact that is not true. It was a rebate, and that rebate was handed over to one individual. If he saw proper to distribute it among the growers, all right. I justify the Santa Fe in that. I am opposed to rebates in any shape or form or manner, but if you are fighting the devil you will have to fight him with fire. The Santa Fe would not have received a carload of fruit from the Sacramento River in the way of tonnage to its system if it had made a reduction of $35 a car on refrigeration."

CALIFORNIA FRUIT TRUST.

The California Fruit Trust was described by Mr. Stevens, a fruit grower of Sacramento, Cal., who appeared before the committee as a representative of the Horticultural Convention of California, of the transportation committee of which organization he had for twelve years been chairman. Mr. Stevens declared that he represented on this subject the sentiment of 95 per cent of the fruit growers of his State. He described the organization of the "California Fruit Distributers." This association was formed in 1902, and represents a remarkable instance of the creation of monopoly power through railroad favoritism. The Southern Pacific Railroad gives an exclusive contract to the Armour car lines. Through this contract the Armour lines control absolutely the shipment of fruit from the Sacramento Valley, except where the Santa Fe enters. On a basis of mutual advantage and community of interest the car line and the "distributers" are on such terms as enable the "distributers" to dominate the markets and all other important factors in the fruit industry.

The California Fruit Distributers is an organization which has all the attributes of a trust. It enjoys a powerful monopoly element, through its relationship with the Armour car line, and this is perpetuated through the exclusive contract granted the car line by the railroad company. As a condition of membership, limitations of the business are agreed to amounting, it would seem, to a combination in restraint of trade. The operation of this restriction is such as to place the control of this fruit business in the hands of three companies—the Earl Fruit Company, Porter Bros. Company, and the Producers' Fruit Company. These companies are all on most friendly terms with the Armour Car Company. This relation which they hold with the car lines enables them to control absolutely the markets and the distribution of California deciduous fruits. How they use this power to further their own interests and to the great detriment of the interests of the growers and public generally is set forth in detail by Mr. Stevens.

These big distributers are engaged in two forms of the fruit business. They ship fruit for the growers on a commission. They buy fruit from the growers, deducting a commission, and sell the fruit in the eastern markets for their own profit. In either case the grower has no voice in saying to whom and where the distribution of this product is proclaimed by the distributers themselves. They say they can prevent gluts. If this is true they can also create gluts, should it be to their interest to do so. Considering the two branches of their business, it is clear that on those consignments which they ship as their own property there are two forces which make for high profits for the distributers. In the first place, they must get a high price in the market in which they sell. In the second place, they must be able to buy the fruit f. o. b. California at a low price. These two objects are attained under this arrangement to a remarkable degree.

To secure good markets and good prices for their own shipments, the distributers have reserved a large proportion of the best markets in the country. They ship the bulk of the commission consignment—shipped for the grower—to the markets of Boston, New York, and Chicago. These are auction markets at which the competition is most severe, and the profits realized on these consignments by the growers are ordinarily small. But it is in the power of the distributers by consigning an unusual quantity to any given point to ruin the market entirely, resulting in loss to growers. This practice so discourages the growers that they are ready to sell f. o. b. California to the distributers at any price which the distributers shall designate.

Meanwhile the markets reserved by the distributers for their own product are paying them good prices for the fruit which they, because of the market conditions which they have created, are able to buy of the growers at their own prices.

In evidence of the correctness of these statements the attention of the committee was called to several statements setting forth in detail the facts as to distribution and prices in various markets of California of deciduous fruits in recent years. Several particular instances were cited by Mr. Stevens in which the growers ship consignments of this fruit at a considerable net loss. With reference to the distribution of consignment business, the following statement is offered: "Of these 3,664 cars shown here, there were 2,862 sold in New York, Chicago, and Boston, and only 802 sold in 120 other markets, as reported. I have here another table showing a comparison of the prices of 1903 and 1904, showing that the losses on the week ending August 5, 356 cars, averages $429, or an aggregate of $152,724. That is the cars sold in all the markets. That is not one market, or anything of that kind."

In other words, of the total of 3,664 cars sold by the distributers for growers on commision, 2,862 cars, or about 80 per cent of the total, were put into these three biggest auction markets of the country, where the most active competition prevails. Only 802 cars of the growers' shipments were allowed to go to the 120 other markets where fruit is bought in carloads. With this exception these markets were reserved exclusively to the distributers for the sale of the fruits which they had bought f. o. b. California, amounting to something over 3,000 cars. The distributers use these large consignments in auction markets to create gluts and demoralize prices, so that they can make the lowest possible price f. o. b. in California on their f. o. b. business. The greatest prosperity to the distributers is promoted by the destruction of profits to growers on consignment business, by forcing the largest possible amount of the product to be sold to them in California, and by so demoralizing the market that they can get this product at the lowest possible price. Then, by virtue of their absolute control of the distribution of the traffic, they sell the product in the markets which they have built up by this manipulation and restriction of supplies. And it should ever be remembered that the power of the fruit trust to do these things is founded in the relationship which it has with the car line, which in turn derives its monopoly power through the exclusive contract by which it enjoys discriminations in its favor at the hands of the railroads. The existence of this fruit trust, as the existence of every other trust, is traceable directly to the discriminations and favoritism of the railways.

DELEGATE FROM ALASKA.

Mr. NELSON submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 956) providing for the election of a Delegate to the House of Representatives from the district of Alaska, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with the following amendment, in lieu of and as a substitute for the amendment of the House, to wit:

"An act providing for the election of a Delegate to the House of Representatives from the Territory of Alaska.

"Be it enacted, etc., That the people of the Territory of Alaska shall be represented by a Delegate in the House of Representatives of the United States, chosen by the people thereof in the manner and at the time hereinafter prescribed, and who shall be known as the Delegate from Alaska. Such Delegate shall at the time of his election have been for seven years a citizen of the United States, and shall be an inhabitant and qualified voter of the district of Alaska, and shall be not less than twenty-five years of age, and when duly chosen and qualified shall possess the same powers and privileges and be entitled to the same rate of compensation as the Delegates in the House of Representatives from the Territories of the United States: Provided, however, That such Delegate, in lieu of all other allowances, shall, in addition to his salary, receive the sum of one thousand five hundred dollars per annum, which shall cover all mileage and other expenses except stationery allowance and compensation for clerk hire.

"SEC. 2. That the first election for Delegate from Alaska shall be held upon the second Tuesday of August, in the year nineteen hundred and six, and that all subsequent elections for such Delegate shall be held on the second Tuesday in August in each year when there is a general election for Members of the House of Representatives, and that at said first election there shall be elected a Delegate who shall hold his office for the unexpired portion of the Fifty-ninth Congress, which term of office is hereinafter designated as the 'short term;' and also at said first election there shall be elected a Delegate who shall hold his office for the full term of the Sixtieth Congress, which term of office is hereinafter designated as the 'long term.'

"That the Delegate chosen at said first election for the short term shall hold his office from the date of his election certificate during the remainder of the Fifty-ninth Congress; and the Delegate chosen at said first election for the long term shall hold his office for the full term of the Sixtieth Congress; that the Delegate chosen at each subsequent election shall hold his office for the same term as the Members of the House of Representatives chosen at the general election in the same year.

"That the salary and allowances of the Delegate chosen for the short term at said first election shall begin with the date of his election certificate, and shall extend throughout and until the close of the Fifty-ninth Congress. The salary and allowances of the Delegate chosen for the long term at said first election shall begin at the commencement of the term of the Sixtieth Congress and extend throughout and until the close thereof. The salary and allowances of the Delegate chosen at each subsequent election shall be for the full term of the Congress to which he is elected a Delegate.

"SEC. 3. That all male citizens of the United States twenty-one years of age and over who are actual and bona fide residents of Alaska, and who have been such residents continuously during the entire year immediately preceding the election, and who have been such residents continuously for thirty days next preceding the election in the precinct in which they vote, shall be qualified to vote for the election of a Delegate from Alaska.

"SEC. 4. That each incorporated town in the district of Alaska shall constitute an election district, and where the population of such town exceeds one thousand inhabitants the common council may, in their discretion, at least thirty days before the election, divide the district into two or more voting precincts and define the boundaries of each precinct; and the said common council shall also appoint, at least thirty days before the election, three judges of election and two clerks for each voting precinct, all of whom shall be qualified voters of the precinct; and no more than two judges and one clerk shall belong to the same political party. The common council shall also, at least thirty days before the date of the election, provide a suitable polling place for each voting precinct and give due notice of the election by posting a written or printed notice in three public places in each precinct, specifying the time and place of the election, and in case there are one or more newspapers of general circulation published in the town, then a copy of said notice shall also be published in one of such newspapers at least once a week for two consecutive weeks next prior to the date of the election.

"SEC. 5. That all of the territory in each recording district now existing or hereafter created situate outside of an incorporated town shall, for the purposes of this act, constitute one election district; that in each year in which a Delegate is to be elected the commissioner in each of said election districts shall, at least thirty days before the date of said first election and at least sixty days before the date of each subsequent election, issue an order and notice, signed by him and entered in his records in a book to be kept by him for that purpose, in which said order and notice he shall—

"First. Divide his election district into such number of voting precincts as may in his judgment be necessary or convenient, defining the boundaries of each precinct by natural objects and permanent monuments or landmarks, as far as practicable, and in such manner that the boundaries of each can be readily determined and become generally known from such description, specify a polling place in each of said precincts, and give to each voting precinct an appropriate name by which the same shall thereafter be designated: Provided, however, That no such voting precinct shall be established with less than thirty qualified voters resident therein; that the precincts established as aforesaid shall remain as permanent precincts for all subsequent elections, unless discontinued or changed by order of the commissioner of that district.

"Second. Give notice of said election, specifying in said notice, among other things, the date of such election, the boundaries of said voting precincts as established, the location of the polling place in each precinct, and the hours between which said polling places will be open.

"Said order and notice shall be given publicity by said commissioner by posting copies of the same at least twenty days before the date of said first election, and at least thirty days before the date of each subsequent election. Said copies shall be posted as follows: One at the office of the commissioner in said district, and three copies to be posted in three conspicuous public places in each of said voting precincts as established, one of which shall be the designated polling place in each precinct; and said commissioner shall also mail a certified copy of said order and notice to the governor of Alaska at his official residence.

"That at least thirty days prior to the date of the holding of such election the commissioner shall select, notify, and appoint from among the qualified electors in each voting precinct three judges of election for said precinct, no more than two of whom shall be of the same political party. Said commissioner shall notify all of said judges of election of their appointment as such, so that each and all of them shall receive said notice at least ten days before the date of the election.

"SEC. 6. That the judges of election of each voting precinct shall constitute the election board for said precinct, and shall supervise and have charge of the election therein. They shall secure and provide a place for holding the election and a suitable ballot box. They shall pass upon the qualification of the voter and, if he be found qualified, receive and deposit his ballot in the ballot box, and shall canvass and make a return of the votes cast, as hereinafter provided.

"That the members of said election board in each precinct, before entering upon the duties of their office, shall each severally take an oath, which shall be reduced to writing, before an officer qualified to administer oaths, to honestly, faithfully, and promptly perform the duties of their positions; and if no officer qualified to administer oaths be present or available, then any one of said duly appointed or selected judges of election may administer the necessary oath to said other two judges, and he shall afterwards in turn be sworn by one of them.

"That each of said judges shall have authority to administer any oath to the voter necessary or proper under this act, and said judges shall have equal authority; and in case of any question or disagreement over any matter during the course of said election the decision of the majority of said judges shall govern.

"That two of the three judges of election in each voting precinct, outside of incorporated towns, to be selected by a majority of said judges shall also perform the duties of clerks of election for that precinct; the two judges performing the duties of clerks shall be of different political parties; it shall be the duty of the clerks at each voting precinct to make a full written record of such election as held in that precinct, and each of them shall keep a correct duplicate register and enter therein the names of the voters and the fact that they have voted, or have offered to vote and were refused, and a brief statement of the reasons for said refusal.

"SEC. 7. That each of the candidates for the office of Delegate herein provided for, at any election held hereunder, shall be entitled to one watcher at each voting precinct, who shall be permitted to be present within the place of voting at such precinct, and in some place therein where he may at all times be in full view of every act done. Such watcher shall have the right to be so present at all times from the opening of the polls until the ballots are finally counted and the result certified by the election board. Each watcher shall be required to present to the election board proper credentials, signed by the candidate he represents, showing him to be the duly authorized watcher for such person.

"SEC. 8. That in case any of the judges of election selected as herein provided for any precinct shall fail to appear and qualify at the time and place designated for the election for which they shall be appointed, then, in that event, the qualified voters present may, by a majority viva voce vote, select a suitable person or persons to fill the vacancy or vacancies in said election board; and the person or persons so selected shall qualify and serve on said election board, with the same powers and in the same manner as if appointed as hereinbefore provided.

"SEC. 9. That the election boards herein provided for shall keep the several polling places open for the reception of votes from eight o'clock antemeridian until seven o'clock postmeridian on the day of election. The voting at said election shall be by printed or written ballot. The ballot at said first election shall be substantially in the following form:

"'FOR DELEGATE FROM ALASKA.

"'For the short term (here insert the name of the person voted for).

"'For the long term (here insert the name of the person voted for).'

"At all elections after said first election the ballot shall be substantially in the following form:

"'For Delegate from Alaska.

"'(Here insert the name of the person voted for.)'

"Such ballot shall be folded by the voter so as not to disclose the vote, and by him handed to any one of the judges of election, who shall immediately, in the presence of the voter and of all the members of the election board, deposit the same, folded as aforesaid, in the ballot box, where the same shall remain untouched until the polls are closed. At the time the ballot is so deposited the clerks of election shall each of them enter in his duplicate register the name of the voter and the fact that he has voted.

"SEC. 10. That any person offering to vote may be challenged by any election officer or any other person entitled to vote at the same polling place, or by any duly appointed watcher, and when so challenged, before being allowed to vote he shall make and subscribe to the following oath: 'You do solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that you are twenty-one years of age and a citizen of the United States; that you are an actual and bona fide resident of Alaska, and have been such resident during the entire year immediately preceding this election, and have been a resident in this voting precinct for thirty days next preceding this election, and that you have not voted at this election,' and further naming the place from which the voter came immediately prior to living in the precinct in which he offers to vote, and giving the length of time of his residence in the former place. And when he has made such an affidavit he shall be allowed to vote; but if any person so challenged shall refuse or fail to take such oath and sign such affidavit, then his vote shall be rejected; and any person swearing falsely in any such affidavit shall be guilty of perjury and shall, upon conviction thereof, suffer punishment as is prescribed by law for persons guilty of perjury.

"SEC. 11. That the election board at each polling place, as soon as the polls are closed, shall immediately publicly proceed to open the ballot box and count and canvass the votes cast, and they shall thereupon, under their hands and seals, make out in duplicate a certificate of the result of said election, specifying the number of votes, in words and figures, cast for each candidate, and they shall then immediately carefully and securely seal up in one envelope one of said duplicate certificates and one of the registers of voters, all the ballots cast, and all affidavits made, and mail such envelope, with said papers inclosed, at the nearest post-office by registered mail, if possible, duly addressed to the governor of Alaska at his place of residence, with the postage prepaid thereon.

"The other duplicate certificate and register of voters, with the oaths of the judges of election, the judges of election shall at once seal up in an envelope addressed to the clerk of the district for the division in which the precinct is situate, at his place of residence, with the postage thereon prepaid. And the said clerk shall, as soon as he receives the said duplicate certificate, at once make out and duly mail to the governor of Alaska a certified copy of such certificate, and deposit the same in the nearest post-office, by registered mail, if possible.

"The clerks of the district courts for the various divisions of Alaska and the governor of Alaska shall each retain and carefully preserve all such documents received by them until the end of the term for which the Delegate chosen has been elected.

"SEC. 12. That the governor, the surveyor-general, and the collector of customs for Alaska shall constitute a canvassing board for the Territory of Alaska to canvass and compile in writing the vote specified in the certificates of election returned to the governor from all the several election precincts as aforesaid.

"The said canvassing board shall commence the performance of its duties at the office of the governor within ten days after the third Tuesday of October in each year in which an election is held under and by virtue of this act, and shall continue with such work from day to day until the same is completed; and said canvass shall be publicly made.

"In case it shall appear to said board that no election return as hereinbefore prescribed has been received by the governor from any precinct in which an election has been held, the said board may accept in place thereof the certified copy of the certificate of election for such precinct received from the clerk of the court, and may canvass and compile the same with the other election returns.

"Said board, upon the completion of said canvass, shall declare the person who has received the greatest number of votes for Delegate to be the duly elected Delegate from Alaska for the term for which he has been so elected, and shall issue and deliver to him in writing under their hands and seals a certificate of his election.

"SEC. 13. That each newspaper in Alaska authorized to publish the notice of election provided for herein, and having published the same according to law, shall be entitled to receive therefor not more than ten dollars for the entire publications of any one election; that each commissioner in the Territory of Alaska is authorized to contract for the proper posting of all election notices, as provided herein, in each voting precinct created in his said election district, and that not more than the sum of ten dollars shall be allowed at each election for the posting of said notices in any one voting precinct in Alaska; that not more than ten dollars at each election shall be allowed for the rental of a proper polling place in each voting precinct in Alaska; that each of the judges of election who shall qualify and serve as such in any precinct on said election day and each of the clerks of election in an incorporated town shall be entitled to a compensation of five dollars for all services performed.

"SEC. 14. That the compensation for said newspaper publications, the proper posting of said notices, the rental of said polling places, the fees of the judges and clerks of election in each precinct, together with the cost of securing a ballot box and the cost of necessary postage and stationery, shall be certified with proper vouchers and receipts attached by the various election officials to the judge of the district court in the said judicial division in which said voting precinct is situate, and the same shall be audited by said judge and shall be paid by the clerk of the court of said division out of the same fund and in the same manner as the incidental expenses of said district court are paid.

"SEC. 15. That any person who, by any means, shall hinder, delay, prevent, or obstruct any other person from qualifying himself to vote or from lawfully voting at any election herein provided for, or who shall knowingly personate and vote or attempt to vote in the name of any other person, or who shall vote more than once at the same election, or shall vote at a place where or at any time when he may not lawfully be entitled to vote, or shall do any unlawful act to secure an opportunity to vote, for himself or for any other person, or who, by or through any force, threat, intimidation, bribery, reward, or offer thereof, unlawfully vote himself or procures another to vote, or prevents or induces another to refrain from exercising his right of suffrage, or induces by any means any officer of an election to do any unlawful act or omit to do his duty in any manner, or who, directly or indirectly, in any manner shall fraudulently change or cause to be changed the returns or the true and lawful result of any election hereunder, or shall attempt to do the same, or who shall delay, cause to be delayed, or connive at the delay of election returns in any manner or attempt to do so, shall be guilty of a crime, and upon the conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than five hundred dollars nor less than one hundred dollars, or imprisoned not more than three years, or both, in the discretion of the court, and pay the costs of the prosecution; and every officer of an election held hereunder who neglects to perform or violates any duty imposed upon him as such officer, or knowingly does any unauthorized act with the intent to affect the election or the result thereof, or who shall permit, make, or connive at any false count or certificate of election, or who shall conceal, withhold, destroy, or willfully delay the returns of election, or connive at the same being done, or who shall aid, counsel, or procure any person to do or attempt to do any act made a crime hereinbefore, or shall attempt to do any of the acts hereinbefore mentioned, shall be guilty of a crime, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than two hundred dollars nor more than one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment of not more than five years, or both, in the discretion of the court, and shall pay all costs of the prosecution; and jurisdiction of all such matters is hereby conferred upon the district court of Alaska.

"SEC. 16. That this act shall take effect upon its passage."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act providing for the election of a Delegate to the House of Representatives from the Territory of Alaska."

The report was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. C. R. MCKENNEY, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 141) for the further relief of sufferers from earthquake and conflagration on the Pacific coast.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15331) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator from Minnesota will turn to page 44 of the bill, line 23, after the word "court," he will see that the amendment should be amended by inserting the words "to be known as recording district No. 30."

Mr. CLAPP. That amendment is accepted by the committee.

Mr. LODGE. Were not those amendments of the committee all passed over?

Mr. LONG. Yes; but we are turning back to make corrections.

Mr. LODGE. They are not being taken up now for disposition?

Mr. LONG. No; the committee amendment has been agreed to. This is a correction of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the amendment of the committee on page 44, proposed to be amended by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG], will be considered as open to amendment. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 44, line 23, after the word "court," it is proposed to amend the committee amendment already agreed to by inserting the words "to be known as recording district No. 30;" so as to read:

That in addition to the places now provided by law for holding courts in the central judicial district of Indian Territory, terms of the district court of the central district shall hereafter be held at the town of Wilburton, and the United States judge of said central district is hereby authorized to establish by metes and bounds a recording district for said court, to be known as recording district No. 30.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LONG. On page 48 I move to strike out line 25 and all of page 49.

Mr. CLAPP. That is also agreeable to the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the amendment of the committee will be considered as open to amendment. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the committee amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 48, after line 24, it is proposed to strike out:

That the present boundaries of recording district No. 18, in the Indian Territory, is hereby amended so as to read as follows: Beginning at a point at the South Canadian River where the same intersects the range line between ranges 3 and 4 east; thence south on said range line to a section line 3 miles south of the township line between townships 4 and 5 north; thence west on said line to the meridian line between ranges 4 and 5 west; thence north on said meridian line to the South Canadian River; thence down said South Canadian River, following the meanderings thereof, to the place of beginning. The place of record for district No. 18 shall be Purcell.

That the present boundaries of recording district No. 17, in the Indian Territory, is hereby amended so as to read as follows: Beginning at a point 3 miles south of the township line between townships 4 and 5 north where said line intersects with the range line between ranges 3 and 4 east; thence south along said range line to the base line; thence west on said base line to the meridian line between ranges 4 and 5 west; thence north on said meridian line to a section line 3 miles south of the township line between townships 4 and 5 north; thence east on said section line to the place of beginning. The place of record for district No. 17 shall be Pauls Valley.

Mr. CLAPP. There is no objection to that amendment on the part of the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a disagreement to the amendment of the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The adoption of the amendment would operate as a disagreement to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LONG. On page 50, line 3, after the word "numbered," I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out the words "seventeen, eighteen, and."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the committee amendment will be considered as open to amendment. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 50, line 3, after the word "numbered," it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by striking out the words "seventeen, eighteen, and;" so as to read:

That it is further provided that all the provisions of the act of Congress approved February 19, 1903, shall apply to districts No. 27, where applicable. That all laws or parts of laws in conflict with the provisions hereof are hereby repealed.

Mr. CLAPP. There is no objection to that amendment on the part of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest that the amendment last agreed to makes necessary an amendment changing the word "districts" to "district," in line 3.

Mr. LONG. That is right. On page 50, line 3, before the word "numbered," I move to strike out "districts" and insert "district."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to submit the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the proposed amendment to the pending bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the agreement, the committee amendments are to be first considered.

Mr. LONG. On page 48, line 11, I move to strike out the word "twenty-seven" and insert the word "twenty-nine."

The SECRETARY. On page 48, line 11, it is proposed to strike out "twenty-seven" and insert "twenty-nine;" so as to read:

That the territory next hereinafter described shall be known as recording district No. 29.

Mr. CLAPP. That is accepted.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will inquire of the Senator from North Carolina whether his proposed amendment is in connection with the committee amendments that are now under consideration?

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what I propose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Then the Senator's amendment is in order. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 50, after line 6, it is proposed to insert the following:

That in addition to the places now provided by law for holding courts in the western judicial district of Indian Territory, terms of the district court of the western district shall hereafter be held at the town of Weleetka, and the United States judge of said western district is hereby authorized to establish by metes and bounds a recording district for said court.

That all laws regulating the holding of courts in the Indian Territory shall be applicable to the court hereby created in the town of Weleetka.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CLAPP. There is no objection on the part of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before the reading of the bill is resumed, I will state that when the bill was before the Senate on a former occasion I asked that the first amendment on page 2 be passed over. I wish to say now that I have no objection to the amendment, and it may as well be acted upon now as at any other time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2 of the bill, the committee reported an amendment to strike out:

That no part of the moneys herein appropriated for fulfilling treaty stipulations shall be available or expended unless expended without regard to the attendance of any beneficiary at any school other than a Government school.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Mission schools on an Indian reservation may, under rules and regulations prescribed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, receive for such Indian children duly enrolled therein the rations of food and clothing to which said children would be entitled under treaty stipulations if such children were living with their parents.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. While we are dealing with amendments, I observe on page 24 the committee reported an amendment to strike out lines 12, 13, 14, and 15 of the bill. I ask that they be reinstated. I am satisfied it was a mistake to strike them out.

Mr. KEAN. Do you propose to reinstate the same amount?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was about to ask whether the Senator is aware of the fact that the Department thinks that $2,000 is sufficient, while the House inserted $8,000?

Mr. CLAPP. I was not aware of that.

Mr. KEAN. That is the reason why I asked whether the Senator proposed the same amount.

Mr. TELLER. What page is it?

Mr. KEAN. Page 24, lines 12, 13, 14, and 15.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have information that the Department would recommend $2,000. The Department thinks that is a sufficient sum.

Mr. CLAPP. I do not think there has been any recommendation. If there has been, it has escaped my attention. However, we can make it two thousand, and it can be changed in conference, if necessary.

Mr. GALLINGER. Exactly.

Mr. CLAPP. The clerks may enter it at $2,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 24, after line 11, the committee reported an amendment to strike out the following:

For the purpose of removing obstructions from the bed of the stream which drains into the Eel River in the Round Valley Reservation, Mendocino County, Cal., $8,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota will now be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 14 it is proposed to strike out "eight" and insert "two;" so as to read "$2,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, beginning in line 7 on page 50. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 50, after line 16, to insert the following:

That Leander J. Fish, an allottee of 200 acres of land in section 32, township 29, range 23 east, and of 40 acres in section 14, township 29, range 24 east, in the Quapaw Reservation, under the provisions of the act of March 2, 1895 (28 Stat. L., p. 907), and the act of March 3, 1901 (31 Stat. L., p. 1058), be, and he is hereby, authorized to alienate such portion of said land as he may see fit, not exceeding 120 acres, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, and any conveyance of such land made by said Fish shall be executed subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. KEAN. I should like to have some explanation of this amendment in regard to Leander J. Fish. I understand the Department thinks that only a patent should be issued in this case.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator will pardon me a moment. Does the Senator mean the first or second amendment?

Mr. KEAN. I mean the first one, beginning in line 17.

Mr. CLAPP. The evidence before the committee was that this man Fish is a very much advanced mixed blood; I think even in Government employ.

Mr. KEAN. My information, I will say to the Senator from Minnesota, is that it is rather in the nature of special legislation, and that the Department sees no reason why it should be enacted. It recommends only the issuance of a patent in fee.

Mr. CLAPP. That is all it provides for, is it not? He is "authorized to alienate such portion of said land as he may see fit, not exceeding a hundred and twenty acres." My recollection is that there is a bridge to be built on his land, and perhaps it would not require that amount; but he and his friends thought that he could get more if he could sell 120 acres than just the particular acreage required for the bridge. It is a matter that was very clear with the committee that there can be no objection to giving him the right.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 51, after line 6, to insert:

That the Court of Claims is hereby authorized to hear and adjudicate the claim of Joseph P. T. Fish, an Indian of nonage, born January 21, 1895, on the Quapaw Reservation, son of Leander J. Fish, a Shawnee by birth, who was duly enrolled on the Quapaw Agency rolls and an allottee of lands therein, to be enrolled and participate in the allotment of lands of the Shawnee-Cherokee Indians, and to have full jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine the claims of said minor child to enrollment, the judgment of said court to be certified to the Secretary of the Interior; and, if the court shall determine that the said minor child is entitled to enrollment with said tribe, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause his name to be so enrolled and lands allotted as to other minor children in said tribe.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to ask the Senator from Minnesota why this boy should not be put on page 41 with the others?

Mr. CLAPP. Page 41?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; where the Commissioner is authorized to add the names of certain persons to the roll of citizens by blood.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator please, that would hardly cure this case. I know of no holding that would relieve this case. This boy was born of a certain parentage, but born within a tribe other than that of his parents. He is now thrown out by the tribe of his parents, on the ground that he was not born there, and he is thrown out of the tribe in which he was born on the ground that his parents were not members of the tribe. Whether or not he should be enrolled where he was born is a question that is involved in a great many cases here, and we do not want to take it up until the Department of Justice gets through with it. We are perfectly willing that he should test his right to enrollment in the Court of Claims, and so it was put in that form. He can only bring a suit there and test his right to enrollment in the tribe of his parents.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Seminoles (treaty)," on page 52, after line 17, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury belonging to the Creek Nation, to C. W. Turner, of Muskogee, Ind. T., Creek warrant No. 2671, drawn on the Creek treasurer on March 12, 1898, for $1,000, and now unpaid, which said warrant was drawn under an appropriation act of the Creek council, was presented to the Creek treasurer for payment, and is yet unpaid: Provided, That before any payment is made to said Turner he shall prove, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior, that he is an innocent holder of said warrant and was a purchaser of the same in good faith.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, after line 5, to insert:

That no person who has been or may hereafter be an employee of the Government under the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, or its successor, shall be permitted to practice in any manner as an agent or attorney before the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes within two years after said person shall cease to be an employee of the Government.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It occurs to me that there should be a change in line 6, so as to read: "That no person who is or may hereafter be."

There may be cases where men have within the last year or two left the employment of the Government and are now engaged in practice, and this would operate as an injustice to them.

Mr. CLAPP. There is no objection to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the word "who," in line 6, it is proposed to strike out "has been" and to insert "now is;" so as to read:

That no person who now is or may hereafter be.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, on page 53, after line 12, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to continue the publication of the Cherokee Advocate, at Tahlequah, Ind. T., until June 30, 1907, and to pay the expense of the same out of the tribal funds of the Cherokee Nation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, after line 18, to insert:

That the Court of Claims is hereby authorized and directed to hear and adjudicate the claims against the Choctaw Nation of the heirs of Peter P. Pitchlynn, deceased, and of the heirs of Samuel Garland, deceased, and the claim of Chester Howe, his associates and assigns, against the Mississippi Choctaws, and to render judgment thereon in such amounts as may appear to be equitably due. Said judgments, if any, in favor of the heirs of Pitchlynn, and the heirs of Garland, aforesaid, shall be paid out of any funds in the Treasury of the United States belonging to the Choctaw Nation, and said judgment, if any, in favor of Chester Howe, his associates or assigns aforesaid, shall be paid out of any funds due or to become due the defendants in said suit, said judgment to be rendered on the principal of quantum meruit for services rendered and expenses incurred under contracts with the defendants. Notice of said suit shall be served on the governor of the Choctaw Nation, and the Attorney-General of the United States shall appear and defend in said suit on behalf of said nation and said Mississippi Choctaws.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] would like to have the amendment passed over until he is present.

Mr. CLAPP. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senate to go back to page 26, and I wish to offer an amendment that should have been offered some time ago. After the words "one thousand dollars," in line 7, I desire to offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 26, line 7, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to insert:

To Jarib L. Sanderson, of Boulder, Colo., the sum of $7,740, being the amount allowed him as surviving partner of the firm of Barlow, Sanderson & Co., on December 7, 1886, under treaty stipulations with the Cheyenne tribe of Indians, and not heretofore paid.

Mr. TELLER. I want to say, if anybody has any curiosity, that this is a judgment of the Court of Claims.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 54, after line 13, to insert:

That to enable the Red River Bridge Company, of Denison, Tex., to acquire land necessary to the proper conduct and operation of its property, Wyatt S. Hawkins, an intermarried citizen of the Chickasaw Nation, is hereby authorized to sell and convey the whole or any part of the homestead allotted to him as such intermarried citizen, and all restriction on the alienation of such homestead imposed by any existing law is hereby removed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have occasion to know that the Indian Office, and very likely the Department itself, have some objection to giving this person the right to convey all of his homestead, and the suggestion has been made that if the right were given to dispose of whatever part of it was required for the operation of the bridge, it would be better legislation. I therefore submit the amendment I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire proposes an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "convey," in line 18, it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert:

Such part of the homestead allotted to him as such intermarried citizen as may be absolutely necessary for the proper operation of the bridge, and all restriction on the alienation of such portion of said homestead imposed by any existing law is hereby removed.

Mr. CLAPP. I should like to offer a suggestion. It is not known how much of the land may be required. The amendment to the amendment would simply allow him to sell so much as might be absolutely necessary, when with the bridge going there he could realize very much more per acre for his land if he were allowed to sell it all. It seems to me it is an unnecessary restriction upon him. It simply goes to the possible price he may get for his land. I do not care anything about it personally.

Mr. TELLER. This is a homestead of only 40 acres. There was some evidence that there would not be enough left of this land to be of any value after the bridge was erected. Therefore it was thought best to let him dispose of the whole of it, and allow the bridge company to buy it if it wanted to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I confess I had an impression that the homestead was larger than 40 acres.

Mr. TELLER. No; it is only 40 acres.

Mr. CLAPP. It is a little homestead.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a matter in which I have no interest, of course. The rule ordinarily is that if a man sells a portion of his estate to a bridge company, he gets better pay for it—a larger relative value—than if he sells the entire tract.

So I think the point the Senator from Minnesota made would not hold in this or any other similar case. However, if the Senator in charge of the bill has considered it—and the Senator from Colorado knows more about it than I do—I thought it was a much larger homestead than 40 acres, I confess——

Mr. TELLER. No.

Mr. GALLINGER. If those Senators think the amendment is proper as it is in the bill, I have no objection to it.

Mr. TELLER. The first proposition was to allow him to sell 20 acres. We finally considered that it was better to let him sell all of it and get the money.

Mr. GALLINGER. As the matter will go to conference, I withdraw the proposed amendment to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 54, after line 21, to insert:

That all restrictions as to the sale, incumbrance, or taxation of the lands heretofore allotted to William P. Ross, of Tahlequah, Maud W. Ross, Edward G. Ross, Mrs. Josephine Rider, William P. Ross, of Bartlesville, Nevermore Trainer, Annie C. Bennett, Nathan F. Adams, Annie Potts, Sam Spade, French Youngpig, and Mase Squirrel, all citizens of the Cherokee Nation, Indian Territory, and duly enrolled as such, be, and the same are hereby, removed.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether I am correctly informed that, under the act of April 21, 1904, it is now within the Secretary's power to remove the restriction, so that the land may be sold for town-site purposes?

Mr. CLAPP. There are four or five of these cases, and the report is quite full with respect to them. As to the first one it says:

William P. Ross, Tahlequah, about 30 years old, one-fourth Cherokee, well educated, unmarried. Is in last stages of consumption and wants to realize on property so as to go West and try to regain his health.

Mr. LODGE. He also applied for the removal of the restriction, and his application has been approved. So he does not need——

Mr. CLAPP. I do not know whether it has been approved or not.

Mr. LODGE. The information I get from the Bureau is that it has been approved.

Mr. CLAPP. The report continues:

Maud W. Ross, about 30 years old, one-fourth Cherokee, married. Is graduate of the Cherokee Female Seminary, which institution she attended for ten years.

Edward G. Ross, 48 years old, one-fourth Cherokee. Attended the Cherokee schools and college for over ten years and was a student at Lawrenceville, N. J., for three years and afterwards for one year at the business college in St. Louis. He has tuberculosis and wants to realize on his property and go West to the mountains.

Mrs. Josephine Rider, age 57, one-fourth Cherokee. Has good common school education. Is now incurably insane, and in Hiawatha Insane Asylum at Canton, S. Dak. The money is needed for her comfort and support. Her son is in the United States Army, at Angel Island, Cal.

W. P. Ross, of Bartlesville, is 44 years old, one-fourth Cherokee. Attended the public schools and Cherokee Male Seminary for fifteen years, the Lawrenceville High School, at Lawrenceville, N. J., for three years. Is printer and editor by profession, and a business man of wide experience. Wants to handle his own property for the benefit of himself and family.

Nevermore Trainer, one-eighth Cherokee, 23 years of age. Graduate of the Cherokee Seminary, and at present a school-teacher.

Mr. LODGE. He has applied and has had the restriction removed.

Mr. CLAPP. All I know about it is this, Senator: These people wrote up here—the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] had this matter in charge—and they asked to have these restrictions removed; and certainly I can see no objection to the removal of restrictions in respect of that class of people.

Mr. LODGE. Why is it necessary to do it in the bill? The act of April 21, 1904, has been on the statute books two years. Of the persons mentioned in the amendment only Ross, Trainer, Annie C. Bennett, and Nathan F. Adams have applied for the removal of the restriction on their allotments, and their applications have been approved.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator knew the trouble incident to getting the restrictions removed by application, he would understand why people are anxious to get them removed by legislation. If these people are ever to take their property, it is only an act of common justice, it seems to me, to give it to them.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator from Massachusetts is certainly misinformed as to some of the persons whom he has mentioned as having had the restrictions removed.

Mr. LODGE. I inquired of the Bureau, and I got the direct information that four of these people had applied, and that their applications had been approved; that none of the others had applied.

I also get the information that two of them are full-blood Indians, and that removing the restriction is a direct contradiction of the law we passed the other day, and sets a precedent in the Indian Territory which the Department say they consider very unfortunate.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It has been done time and time again.

Mr. LODGE. French Youngpig and Mase Squirrel are full-blood Indians, and to remove their restrictions by legislative enactment seems to be in direct conflict with the policy Congress is pursuing, as the conferees' report of April 9, 1906 (Senate Document No. 307), on H. R. 5976, shows that section 19 of that bill has been amended by the conferees so as not to permit any full-blood Indian of the Five Civilized Tribes "to alienate, sell, dispose of, or encumber in any manner any of the lands allotted to him for a period of twenty-five years from the approval of the act." The Department further say it would establish an unfortunate precedent in the Indian Territory.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am sure the Senator is misinformed as to some of those whose applications he says have been approved.

Mr. LODGE. Very likely. I have no personal knowledge of it. Being very ignorant, I asked for some information.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The peculiar circumstances connected with each one of these cases, as the report will show, will convince the Senator why there should be a legislative enactment.

Mr. LODGE. Does not the Senator think these two full-blood Indians ought to come out anyway, as it seems to be in direct conflict with the law passed the other day?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Not if the particular circumstances are such that they should be made exceptions to the general law.

Mr. LODGE. Can that not be dealt with under the law of 1904?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not think it can be. I will turn to it in just a moment. Here are the circumstances under which that is desired, I will say to the Senator:

Annie Potts, Sam Spade, French Youngpig, and Mase Squirrel, mixed blood adult Cherokees, who desire to dispose of their allotments to the Prairie Oil Company for an oil-tank farm. It is necessary that this should be disposed of in a body, as lands for tank-farm purposes must be contiguous.

It seems that the necessity is on the part of the industry.

Mr. LODGE. There is a conflict between that report and the one I am reading from. The report I get is that Youngpig and Squirrel are full bloods, and it appears the necessity is in order to sell their allotments to an oil company.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That seems to be the necessity. If the Senator is acquainted with that necessity, he will appreciate that it is quite a material one to the growth of the country.

Mr. LODGE. Of course I have no desire in the matter whatever, except to protect the Indians' rights.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will say to the Senator that I know nothing whatever about those particular cases, but with respect to the others, as to whom he says his information is that their applications for removal have been approved, I am satisfied his information is erroneous.

Mr. LODGE. It says:

Of the persons mentioned in the amendment only William P. Ross, of Tahlequah, Nevermore Trainer, Annie C. Bennett, and Nathan F. Adams have applied for the removal of the restrictions on their allotments.

Under the law of 1904.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. LODGE (reading). "Their applications have been approved."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. They had not been approved at the time this bill was framed. I can assure the Senator of that.

Mr. LODGE. Then the Commissioner goes on to say:

It is hardly probable that this request for the removal of restrictions originated with the persons whose names are mentioned in the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I can not understand where that information comes from. If the Senator will read this amendment and the report——

Mr. LODGE. I have read the report. This information comes from the Indian Bureau. I have no other source of information.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Why a man who has been the editor of a paper for ten years should not desire the restriction removed, and should wait until some other person interfered for him, is more than I can comprehend. The Senator will notice in looking over this list the reasons for it.

Mr. LODGE. I see the reasons. Did these people themselves ask for it?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Some of them did to my knowledge.

Mr. LODGE. William P. Ross, of Tahlequah, of course, has made the request under the law, and it has been granted.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is where the Senator and I are unfortunately at odds. The request must surely have been granted after this legislation was proposed in the bill. So in regard to the other three he mentioned.

Mr. LODGE. There are apparently two William P. Rosses.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will say in regard to Nathan F. Adams that he is about 28 years of age. His request was made to the Department a long while ago, and up to the time at least when his request was presented to the committee, it had not been approved. As to the others, I can not say when they were——

Mr. LODGE. William P. Ross, of Tahlequah, is the one who has had his application approved. The other one has not applied. With respect to the one of whom the Senator spoke as editor, I will say that it seems very reasonable that such a man should have the restriction removed.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask the Senator in all fairness——

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me that full-blood Indians would be far safer protected by the Department, in a matter of that sort, in selling to an oil company than they would be if compelled to protect themselves.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will say to the Senator that, so far as I know, this is more for the benefit of the oil company, which has been referred to, than for the benefit of the individual Indians themselves. The Senator will observe that it is necessary, if the oil business is to be carried on, that there must be tankage provided, and if tankage is provided there must be land on which to locate it, and it is to be located, of course, at the most favorable point for the oil company. The Indians which the Senator designates as "full bloods" the report designates as "mixed bloods." That is the situation. I think it is quite proper, in an exceptional case like that, that even full bloods shall be allowed to alienate their land.

Mr. CLAPP. But these are designated as "mixed bloods." I understand that they are all mixed bloods.

Mr. LODGE. So they are spoken of in the report. Is that taken from the report?

Mr. CLAPP. It is taken from the document the Senator from Wyoming filed with me. I know but little about it more than the information given in that document. I do not think it could have been possible that these restrictions were removed when these people asked for it.

Mr. LODGE. Suppose we let the amendment go over. Of course I do not want to make any unreasonable objection at all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.

Mr. FORAKER. I desire to ask the Senator why there could not have been incorporated in this same provision two other names—the names of Benjamin Marshall and John A. Jacobs? I understand that these are members of the Creek tribe, and only about half bloods, perhaps not of that much Indian blood. One of the gentlemen—Mr. Marshall—is a real-estate agent, an active business man, with large experience in handling real estate, and he wants to have the privilege of selling his property.

Mr. CLAPP. I will ask that the letters of the two gentlemen be read as some evidence of their ability.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. Jacobs, I understand, is the vice-president of a national bank. It does seem unnecessary to tie up their land for the long period of twenty-one years.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, I do not object to anything of that sort as to the half bloods, but as to the full bloods it seems a direct contradiction of what we did the other day.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if it would not be sufficient for those whom he designates as "full bloods," if that amendment should be passed over, and let the others be incorporated in the bill?

Mr. LODGE. I do not see how we can do that very well. Does the Senator propose that we shall strike out those two names?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No. I mean to pass over those who are designated in the communication as full-blood Indians.

Mr. LODGE. I mean that we can not pass over a part of the amendment and adopt any part of it; we must pass over the whole amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is passed over at the request of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. CLAPP. I offer an amendment in this connection.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he objects to an amendment respecting Marshall and Jacobs?

Mr. LODGE. No; I do not object to that.

Mr. FORAKER. Then I hope, if no one objects to it, that the amendment may be adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the desire of the Senator from Minnesota with respect to the two letters he has sent to the Secretary's desk?

Mr. CLAPP. I will not ask the Senate to hear them read at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 4, on page 55, insert:

That the restrictions upon the alienation of the homestead of Benjamin Marshall, a Creek Indian, it being the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 28, township 16 north, and range 17 east of the Indian base meridian, in Indian Territory, containing 40 acres, be, and the same are hereby, removed.

That the restrictions upon the alienation of the homestead of John A. Jacobs, a Creek Indian, it being the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 18, township 7 north, and range 9 east of the Indian base meridian, in Indian Territory, containing 40 acres, be, and the same are hereby, removed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 55, line 6, after the word "authorized," to insert "and directed;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue a fee-simple patent, etc.

Mr. GALLINGER. This clause relates to the issuing of patents to certain named Indians, and the amendment just read directs the Secretary of the Interior to issue those patents. I will ask the Senator from Minnesota whether he is sure that these are competent Indians?

Mr. CLAPP. As to those names we have now reached, I have only a letter from the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. He says he knows Mr. Richardville well, and feels authorized to indorse all that Mr. Lamar says about him.

Mr. LODGE. Why not leave it to the discretion of the Secretary?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am satisfied the Department would very much prefer to have the words "and directed" omitted from the bill and let it remain as it came from the House in that respect. The Secretary does not feel that he ought to be directed to do this when there might be circumstances connected with these Indians which would make it very unwise and unfortunate for him to do it. I hope the amendment inserting the two words "and directed" may be disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is now no objection to the remainder of the paragraph as proposed to be amended.

The next amendment was, on page 55, line 6, after the word "to" where it occurs the second time, to strike out "Maynard C. Armstrong, Wyandotte allottee numbered 53; William Nichols, Seneca allottee numbered 185" and insert "Eulala Smith, Wyandotte allottee numbered 15; Thomas F. Richardville, Mary Richardville, Katherine R. Simpson, Western Miami Indians;" and in line 12, after the word "allotted," to strike out "him" and insert "them;" so as to make the clause read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue a fee-simple patent to Eulala Smith, Wyandotte allottee numbered 15, Thomas F. Richardville, Mary Richardville, Katherine R. Simpson, Western Miami Indians, for land heretofore allotted them, and the issuance of said patent shall operate as a removal of all restrictions as to the sale, incumbrance, or taxation of the lands so patented.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 55, after line 14, to insert:

For the care and support of insane persons in Indian Territory, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, however, That Indian citizens in said Territory shall be cared for at the asylum in Canton, Lincoln County, S. Dak.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 56, line 10, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "thirty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

For support and education of 750 Indian pupils at the Indian school, Haskell Institute, Lawrence, Kans., and for transportation of pupils to and from said school, $135,250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 56, line 20, to increase the total appropriation for the maintenance of the Haskell Institute, Kans., from $146,250 to $156,250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Sacs and Foxes of the Missouri (treaty)," on page 50, after line 23, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to sell and convey, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, the tract of land located in Kansas City, Kans., reserved for a public burial ground under a treaty made and concluded with the Wyandotte tribe of Indians on the 31st day of January, 1895. And authority is hereby conferred upon the Secretary of the Interior to provide for the removal of the remains of persons interred in said burial ground and their reinterment in the Wyandotte Cemetery at Quindaro, Kans., and to purchase and put in place appropriate monuments over the remains reinterred in the Quindaro Cemetery. And after the payment of the costs of such removal, as above specified, and the costs incident to the sale of said land, and also after the payment to any of the Wyandotte people, or their legal heirs, of claims for losses sustained by reason of the purchase of the alleged rights of the Wyandotte tribe in a certain ferry named in said treaty, if, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, such claims or any of them are just and equitable, without regard to the statutes of limitation, the residue of the money derived from said sale shall be paid per capita to the members of the Wyandotte tribe of Indians who were parties to said treaty, their heirs, or legal representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 60, after line 22, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to issue patents in fee simple to the members of the Sac and Fox of Missouri and Iowa tribes of Indians for the lands heretofore allotted them in Kansas and Nebraska; and the issuance of such patents shall operate to remove all restrictions as to sale, taxation, and incumbrance of the lands so patented.

The next amendment was, on page 61, after line 4, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause all the surplus unallotted lands of the Sac and Fox of Missouri tribe to be allotted to those members born since the completion of allotments to said tribe and alive and in being on June 30, 1906, as near as may be an equal quantity of land in acres, and to issue patents therefor in fee simple, or under the provisions of the fifth section of the act of Congress approved February 8, 1887, 24 Statutes at Large, page 388, in his discretion.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to ask the Senator from Minnesota why the Iowas in Nebraska, who are included in the same report, should not be included here, and whether it was a mere oversight?

Mr. CLAPP. My recollection is that the Department advised us that they had been settled with and ought not to be included. Now, that is merely my present impression.

Mr. LODGE. I asked about this amendment, and I will read the Senator what was sent to me from the Department in regard to it:

The legislation embraced in this part of the bill is identical with the legislation recommended in my report of February 10, 1906, except that the provision appropriating the capital fund of the Iowa Indians has been omitted; hence the legislation will authorize the closing up of the affairs of the Sac and Fox of Missouri Indians so far as these relate to the Government, but will leave the Iowas in Nebraska, who were included in the office report, still to be dealt with. It is true that the amendment authorizes the issuance of patents in fee to both tribes, but is it believed that the paragraph omitted from the office report should be included. It is presumed that this has been omitted through some error, and it is therefore repeated here in order that it may be inserted should the Senate think proper.

SEC. 3. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $57,500, to be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Iowa tribe of Indians, to draw interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, being the balance due said tribe per ninth article of the treaty of May 17, 1854, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to pay said sum to the Indians entitled in cash per capita subject to the provisions of the act of April 21, 1904 (33 Stat. L., p. 201.)

Mr. CLAPP. The Department asks now to have that inserted?

Mr. LODGE. That is what I understand is the request.

Mr. CLAPP. I have no objection, but I am very certain——

Mr. LODGE. I will hand this memorandum to the Senator. He can look over it and add it at any time.

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 61, after line 14, to insert:

That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $157,400, to be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Sac and Fox of Missouri tribes of Indians, to draw interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, being the amount due said tribe per article 2 of the treaty of October 21, 1837, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to pay said sum to the Indians entitled in cash per capita, subject to the provisions of the act of April 21, 1904 (33 Stat. L., p. 201): Provided, That the rights or equities of any person whose claim to an allotment of the Sac and Fox of Missouri Reservation tribal land and who has already instituted proceedings in the United States circuit court for the district of Nebraska to determine such right shall not be affected by any of the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 62, after line 10, after the word "them," to strike out "William A. Margrave, Margaret Margrave, William C. Margrave, James T. Margrave, Earl I. Margrave, Julia Le Clere, and Willie Connell, Sac and Fox of Missouri allottees numbered 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 58, and 27;" so as to make the clause read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to issue fee-simple patents to the following parties for the lands heretofore allotted them, respectively; and the issuance of said patents shall operate as a removal of all restrictions as to the sale, incumbrance, or taxation of the lands so patented.

Mr. CLAPP. I suggest that that paragraph be passed over for the present.

The reading was continued to page 64, line 15, the last line making the total of the items under the heading "Pipestone school," $45,000.

Mr. CLAPP. I think the total should be changed to $49,175.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 15, page 64, strike out "$45,000" and insert "$49,175;" so as to read:

In all, $49,175.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Chippewas of Minnesota, reimbursable (treaty)," on page 65, after line 18, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $197.50 to Martha A. Allen, widow of Hiram W. Allen, late additional farmer at Red Lake Indian Reservation, Minn., said sum being the amount of said Hiram W. Allen's salary withheld for the third quarter, 1885.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 66, after line 2, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay to the heirs of Thomas Le Blanc, deceased, Sioux scout, the sum alleged to be due said heirs, $901.23.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 66, after line 6, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay to D. C. Lightbourn, of Ada, Minn., the sum of $1,244.45; and to George D. Hamilton, of Detroit, Minn., the sum of $830, out of any moneys standing to the credit of the Chippewa Indians, of Mississippi, in payment for bills incurred in advertising; and the said sums are hereby appropriated for said purpose.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to know something about this claim. It is not a very large one, it is true, but on what is it based? I have looked in the report of the committee. Perhaps the Senator can refer me to the place in the report where it is explained. I can not find it mentioned in the index.

Mr. CLAPP. All these Minnesota matters would be under the heading of "Minnesota," in the index. There may be some of the items indexed separately. This came in very late, and it may not be in the report.

I will state the circumstances. These men advertised these lands for sale, under the direction of the agent there, but there is no authority to pay them out of any fund. Sooner or later, I presume, we shall have to enact some legislation to distribute the funds of those Indians and apply those portions which have been expended for these particular purposes against these particular Indians. But these people have rendered this work; they can not get their pay, and there is no reason why they should be made to undergo delay in getting the matter straightened out.

Mr. LODGE. Has the claim ever been investigated or approved by the Indian Office? Has the Senator anything to go on except the claim of the claimants?

Mr. CLAPP. I do not know that it has been approved any more than that the Office said they could not pay it, because they had no authority to use these funds for that purpose. There is no question, as I understand it, about the amount of the two bills. They were bills for printing.

Mr. LODGE. This item is, I think, subject to a point of order. It has not been estimated for by the Department.

Mr. CLAPP. But it comes out of the Indian funds.
Mr. LODGE. That covers only the cases of claims.
Mr. CLAPP. This will be a claim.
Mr. LODGE. This is an appropriation. I understood the ruling of the Senator from Maine to apply to the case of a private claim and not the case of an estimate.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that the point made by the Senator from Massachusetts is well taken.
Mr. LODGE. I will state the reason why I make the point of order.
Mr. CLAPP. Before the Chair makes a decision finally, I should like to look up the authority we had to use last year.
Mr. LODGE (reading)—

The records of the Indian Office do not show any claim or correspondence on this subject, and the item does not specify any date when the claim was incurred.

The Office says it never has been referred to it "for investigation or report."

The fact that it comes out of the Indian funds seems to me only additional reason to be careful about it. It is a very small amount, I know, but those funds are in the nature of a trust fund, and this has never been reported on by any authority.

Mr. CLAPP. Since the Senator has some information there from the Department, I will state that I talked over this matter with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. We went over it, and I suggested to him that the only thing we could do was to pay these claims and then some time pass some legislation to distribute these funds. There was no point made by him and no suggestion on his part but that that was the proper thing to do. I certainly can not understand it if he has said anything adverse to that.
Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Montana?
Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.
Mr. CARTER. This seems to be a rather strange proceeding. Do I understand the chairman of the committee to say that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs did not supply certain facts to the committee and later on sent them to other Senators to be presented on the floor?
Mr. CLAPP. No; the chairman does not say so. The chairman says that in the committee room the chairman called the attention of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to these items of printing of Lightbourne and Hamilton, and suggested that as there was no authority for him to take it out of the fund, the law which provided for printing the notices not having made ample provision in that respect, there was no reason why these men, who had done the work under the direction of the agent, should await the action of Congress until Congress made provision for distributing the fund, and that it seemed that the best plan was to pay them and then when we got to a bill distributing the fund the matter could be corrected as between the individual Indians. Without dissenting at all, I do not recall that he said anything, and it was a silent assent to the proposition. It certainly is surprising to me, in view of that conversation, if anything has been sent here adverse to the proposition.
Mr. LODGE. I merely make the point of order that it has not been estimated for.
Mr. CLAPP. I ask that it be passed over until I can get the case. I think I have the case we had last year that will dispose of the point of order.
Mr. LODGE. It was two years ago, and I think it applies only to private claims.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.
The next amendment was, on page 66, after line 15, to insert:

That the sum of $2,200, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, to settle the account of Charles H. Armstrong on contract No. 115 for survey of Indian lands in the State of Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.
The next amendment was, on page 66, after line 20, to insert:

That there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,091.92, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay said sum to Alice Fairbanks Mee, administratrix of the late George Fairbanks, formerly a member of the firm of Fairbanks Brothers, assignees of W. R. Spears, of claims against Chippewa Indian loggers on the Red Lake Reservation during the logging season of 1884 and 1885, said sum to be immediately available: Provided, That Alice Fairbanks Mee shall furnish satisfactory evidence to the Secretary of the Interior that she is the rightful owner of the claim, the amount being a balance due on time checks and supplies furnished said loggers engaged in logging under contract with Frank J. Johnson: Provided further, That no part of the amount to be charged against any funds belonging to the Chippewa Indians.

The next amendment was, on page 67, after line 2[illegible], to strike out:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to pay from the proceeds of the sale of timber on ceded Chippewa lands in Minnesota, under the act of June 27, 1902, to the superintendent of logging appointed under said act $4 and to his assistant superintendents $2.50 per diem in lieu of subsistence while on duty, said allowances for subsistence to date from the date of appointment of such superintendent and assistants.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the fact that that language as it appeared in the bill as it came from the House of Representatives seemed to the committee to relate to back pay; but I have been advised by the Department that it does not, and that it ought to stand. Therefore, unless objection is made, I will ask that the Senate committee amendment which has just been stated be disagreed to.
The amendment was rejected.
Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, the next amendment of the committee, beginning on line 9 on page 68, is a long one, the consideration of which will take some time. I therefore suggest that we desist for the remainder of the evening.
Mr. CLAPP. I am ready to do so whenever the Senate is.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.
The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 24, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 23, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT OVER UNTIL WEDNESDAY.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

SALE OF INTERNAL-REVENUE STAMPS IN PORTO RICO.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged bill (H. R. 15071), and ask unanimous consent that it may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will be compelled to object to that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Then I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the bill?

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15071) to provide means for the sale of internal-revenue stamps in the island of Porto Rico.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. It is a unanimous report from the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi objects.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. LITTLEFIELD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15071) to provide means for the sale of internal-revenue stamps in the island of Porto Rico.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, to save the time of the House, the bill is reported with an amendment in the nature of a substitute and to perfect the bill. I ask that the reading of the original bill be dispensed with. I move the amendment be adopted, and then the substitute be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut moves that the amendment recommended by the committee be adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed to read the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15071) to provide means for the sale of internal-revenue stamps in the island of Porto Rico.

Be it enacted, etc., That all United States internal-revenue taxes now imposed by law on articles of Porto Rican manufacture coming into the United States for consumption or sale may hereafter be paid by affixing to such articles before shipment thereof a proper United States internal-revenue stamp denoting such payment, and for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to grant to such collector of internal revenue as may be recommended by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and approved by the Secretary, an allowance for the salary and expenses of a deputy collector of internal revenue, to be stationed at San Juan, P. R., and the appointment of this deputy to be approved by the Secretary.

The collector will place in the hands of such deputy all stamps necessary for the payment of the proper tax on articles produced in Porto Rico and shipped to the United States, and the said deputy, upon proper payment made for said stamps, shall issue them to manufacturers in Porto Rico. All such stamps so issued or transferred to said deputy collector shall be charged to the collector and be accounted for by him as in the case of other tax-paid stamps.

The deputy collector assigned to this duty shall perform such other work in connection with the inspection and stamping of such articles, and shall make such returns as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may, by regulations approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, direct, and all provisions of existing law relative to the appointment, duties, and compensation of deputy collectors of internal revenue, including office rent and other necessary expenses, shall, so far as applicable, apply to the deputy collector of internal revenue assigned to duty under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. That before entering upon the duties of his office such deputy collector shall execute a bond, payable to the collector of internal revenue appointing him, in such amount and with such sureties as he may determine.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, Porto Rico is outside of the internal-revenue jurisdiction of the United States. All of the internal-revenue receipts there are now paid into the Porto Rican treasury. Articles coming from Porto Rico to the United States similar to those which are subject to internal taxation here must have United States stamps affixed here, and this is now done by deputies detailed for that work at the principal ports of entry. It is greatly to the inconvenience of the people of Porto Rico. This bill authorizes a deputy collector to be detailed to sell these stamps in Porto Rico instead of affixing them at the dock in New York and New Orleans. While the bill itself is in a form authorizing the appointment of one deputy, as a matter of fact it will simply transfer one out of three to San Juan and accommodate the people in Porto Rico by enabling them to have the work done there. If there is any further question, I will be glad to answer.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Are all the Porto Rican products shipped from the port of San Juan, and can one deputy revenue agent accommodate the entire business?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I think so, substantially; they think so; and it is at their own request this is done.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This, of course, in no wise affects the revenues?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Except that it will probably bring revenue to the United States.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is purely a matter of convenience for Porto Rico?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Convenience for them and economy for us, both. If no one else wishes to make any inquiry, I move that the committee rise and report the bill favorably to the House.

Mr. SULZER. Is this bill unanimously reported from the committee?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. It is a unanimous report from the committee, and is approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the Secretary of the Treasury also. The bill was drawn in the Internal-Revenue Office.

Mr. SULZER. I have no objection to it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please state it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Is it in order to offer an amendment to this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has already agreed to the amendment suggested to the bill by the committee. It depends upon the nature of the amendment as to whether it will be in order.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk, as a new section to the bill.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I am ready to hear the amendment read, but I do not yield for any other purpose.

Insert as section 3:

"Each collector of internal revenue shall, under regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, place and keep conspicuously in his office, for public inspection, an alphabetical list of the names of all persons, who shall have paid special taxes within his district, and shall state thereon the time, place, and business for which such special taxes have been paid, and shall make and preserve a duplicate of the tax receipt or receipts issued to any person, company, or corporation, and upon application of any person he shall furnish a certified copy thereof, as of a public record, for which a fee of $1 for each 100 words or fraction thereof in the copy or copies so requested may be charged."

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that amendment is not germane to this bill.

Mr. PAYNE. And a further point is that the House has already adopted the amendment which the amendment seeks to amend. Of course no amendment will be in order to that.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman from Connecticut reserve his point for a moment. I have to do this in order to get this matter considered at all. I can not wait to take the ordinary procedure, for I can not get the bill considered. I have been trying for several months to get this amendment, which is a bill I have introduced and which has been favorably reported, before the House in order to get an expression of the Members of the House on the subject. I hope the gentleman from Connecticut will not make the point of order, but give the House an opportunity to vote and express its opinion.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The very fact that the bill which the gentleman offers as an amendment has been reported by the committee and is itself an independent proposition on the Calendar, would seem to indicate that it is not germane to this bill.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It is true exactly as the gentleman from Connecticut states. The bill is on the Calendar, and there is no prospect that it will ever be anywhere else. [Laughter.] We are absolutely unable to get it up for consideration except to offer it as an amendment. Let me ask the gentleman from Connecticut if he thinks there is a quorum here. I do not want to make the point, but I would like to have this matter considered and give the House an opportunity to express itself. It won't take ten minutes to vote on this proposition, and if it is right it ought to be on the statute book. The committee has made a unanimous report—the committee of which the gentleman from Connecticut is himself a member. It is a matter that this House ought to be permitted to vote on. I asked unanimous consent at one time and objection was made on the Republican side. I offered it as an amendment to the legislative bill and a point of order was made there, and that point of order came from the Republican side, and now I submit we ought to be permitted to vote on this proposition.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. If the gentleman from Mississippi wants five or ten minutes, I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, what is the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. That the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi is not germane to the bill. The only question for discussion before the committee now is on the point of order, unless it proceeds by unanimous consent. Does the gentleman from Connecticut desire to be heard further on the point of order?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi wish to be heard further on the point of order?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I do not, on the point of order.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Then, Mr. Chairman, I insist that the amendment is not germane.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the Chair is well acquainted with the nature of the bill sought by my colleague to be attached to this as an amendment. Does not the Chair think it is so nearly akin to a bill of his own that it is always in order? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appreciates perfectly well the equitable position that the amendment is in, and also the relation that the Chair sustains thereto in connection with another question, but the Chair likewise appreciates that that does not affect the legal situation before the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Chair think there is any other way to get any of these bills dealing with this subject-matter before the House of Representatives? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that inquiry is entirely immaterial and not germane. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order if no gentleman desires to be heard further. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee now rise and report the bill and amendment to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, before the motion is submitted I want to ascertain if this system of imposing internal-revenue tax is exclusive—that is to say, can goods be brought from Porto Rico and stamps affixed in this country, notwithstanding this bill?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Oh, certainly; but this would obviate the necessity of doing that.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is what I want to know, because you only provide for one deputy stamp agent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill, with the amendment, to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LITTLEFIELD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15071) to provide means for the sale of internal-revenue stamps in the island of Porto Rico, and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended be passed.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HILL of Connecticut, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

INVESTIGATION OF ST. ELIZABETH'S INSANE ASYLUM.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following committee in pursuance of the House resolution for the investigation of the St. Elizabeth's Insane Asylum.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. OLCOTT of New York, Mr. SMYSER of Ohio, Mr. BARCHFELD of Pennsylvania, Mr. HAY of Virginia, and Mr. PADGETT of Tennessee.

EDES HOME.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 4046) to incorporate the Edes Home, which is on the Speaker's table as unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin calls up the bill S. 4046 as unfinished business, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the bill has been once read, and that a reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT] is pending. The Clerk will, without objection, report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 9, at the end of line 9, change the comma to a period, and strike out lines 10 and 11 to and including the word "held" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The property held by the said corporation actually and exclusively used and occupied for the Home provided in section 1 of this act shall, while and so long as so actually and exclusively used and occupied."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

AMERICAN CROSS OF HONOR.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 3045) to incorporate the American Cross of Honor within the District of Columbia, which is on the Speaker's table as unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up from the Speaker's table unfinished business. The Chair understands that the bill has been once read?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have the bill read.

The SPEAKER. The bill has been read on a previous day, but, without objection, the Clerk will again report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That H. A. George, of Charlottesville, Va.; Richard Stocking, of Trenton, N. J.; John J. Delaney, of New York City, N. Y.; Andrew M. Taylor, of Rondout, N. Y.; Eugene Longstreet, of Brielle, N. J., and Thomas H. Herndon, of Washington, D. C., their associates and successors, are hereby created a body politic and corporate within the District of Columbia, by the name of the The American Cross of Honor, for the purpose of bringing into closer relations of fraternal fellowship the said body, and to cause to be perpetuated the memory of the gallant and heroic deeds of those persons upon whom the United States Government has bestowed the life-saving medal of honor.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] to the fact that this bill has not the usual saving clause reserving to the Congress the right to alter, amend, or repeal.

Mr. KEIFER. Does not that follow as a matter of law?

Mr. BABCOCK. If the gentleman thinks that is desirable, I will be glad to accept the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the gentleman should put that provision in every charter that is granted by Congress.

Mr. BABCOCK. The courts have held that is not necessary, but if it will make the gentleman feel any better I will move that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of the bill the following:

"That Congress reserves the right to amend, alter, or repeal this act."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the third reading of the Senate bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

BENEVOLENT AND PROTECTIVE ORDER OF ELKS.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 16730) to prevent the unauthorized wearing or use of badges, names, titles of officers, insignia, ritual, or ceremonies of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the United States of America, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows.

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who willfully wears the badge, insignia, or button of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the United States of America, incorporated in conformity with the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the District of Columbia, on the 19th day of June 1895, or uses the same to obtain aid or assistance in the District of Columbia, or willfully uses the name of such order or organization, the titles of its officers, or its insignia, ritual, or ceremonies, unless entitled to use or wear the same under the constitution and by-laws, rules and regulations of such order, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by a fine not to exceed $20 or imprisonment not to exceed thirty days, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia now on the Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia, with Mr. LITTLEFIELD in the chair.

CONDEMNATION OF INSANITARY BUILDINGS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill S. 47.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 47) to create a board for the condemnation of insanitary buildings in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill may be waived, so that it can be open for amendment now if desired.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be waived, and the bill be open for amendment under the five-minute rule now. Is there objection?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I understand that does not dispense with the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. No; it will be read under the five-minute rule for debate and amendments. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman from Wisconsin going to make any statement in regard to the bill?

Mr. BABCOCK. I will be glad to do so after the bill is read.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman should do it before the bill is read, it seems to me.

Mr. BABCOCK. What does the gentleman say?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman is going to explain the bill, he should do it before the bill is read.

Mr. BABCOCK. I think the committee will understand the bill much better after hearing it read.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The first reading of the bill has been dispensed with, and it is now being read under the five-minute rule, and I suggest the gentleman make a general statement of the purposes of the bill so the committee will understand it.

Mr. BABCOCK. I would say to the gentleman that practically this same bill has passed the House once before and failed in the latter days of last session to pass the other body.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin desire to proceed to make a general statement in regard to the bill?

Mr. BABCOCK. I prefer having the bill read first.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, the trouble about it is if we wait until the bill is read, we can not amend it under the five-minute rule after we find out what it is.

Mr. BABCOCK. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman who made the report [Mr. MORRELL].

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, as was stated by the chairman of the committee, this bill passed the House last year. The bill provides that certain buildings which can not now under the law be entered upon for the purpose of examination as to their sanitary condition may now be entered, and if they are found to be in such a condition that they are incapable of being repaired, or after a specified time the owners refuse to repair them, then they will be demolished under the provisions provided for in the bill. I would like to offer to the committee and have shown to the members of it some photographs of the character of buildings that will be affected by the provisions of this bill. These photographs represent buildings of a character which I think the House will at one realize are a menace to public health [exhibiting photographs]. It is to avoid, Mr. Chairman, an epidemic which might at any moment crop out in these particular portions of Washington and blind alleys where these buildings now exist. Many of these alleys and consequent conditions are in the heart or within a stone's throw of the business and residential quarter, one or two within a few hundred yards of the Capitol itself.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman explain the general principle of the bill? Does it provide for the condemnation and payment of the value of the insanitary buildings?

Mr. MORRELL. If the owners refuse to repair these buildings, the authorities may then proceed under the provisions of the bill which provides a monetary return for the condemnation to the extent of the value of the buildings.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, does this bill include buildings that are dangerous on account of being in a dilapidated condition as well as insanitary buildings?

Mr. MORRELL. No, sir; in answer to the gentleman from Indiana I may say that that is now embraced in a separate bill which has already passed and is now the law.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Suppose a building is insanitary because of lack of cleanliness on the part of the tenant; is there to be any public expense attached to putting that building in a proper sanitary condition?

Mr. MORRELL. The tenants of the buildings or owners have due notice to put their buildings in a proper state of cleanliness or repair, as the case may be.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And if they do not, is the expense charged up to the building?

Mr. MORRELL. No; it is charged as a tax against the real estate.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman, if a building is demolished is there any provision in this bill for compensation to the owner?

Mr. MORRELL. The bill provides if the owner of the building is not satisfied with the amount that is given by the award, the owner can appeal to the supreme court of the District of Columbia for a modification or vacation of the order of condemnation.

Mr. HEPBURN. He is entitled, then, to compensation?

Mr. MORRELL. He is entitled to compensation. If he thinks this compensation is too small, he can appeal to the supreme court.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be, and is hereby, created in and for the District of Columbia a board to be known as the board for the condemnation of insanitary buildings in the District of Columbia, to consist of the assistant to the Engineer Commissioner in charge of buildings, the health officer, and the inspector of buildings of said District, and to have jurisdiction and authority to examine into the sanitary condition of all buildings in said District, to condemn those buildings which are in such insanitary condition as to endanger the health or lives of the occupants thereof or of persons living in the vicinity, and to cause all buildings to be put into sanitary condition or to be vacated, demolished, and removed, as may be required by the provisions of this act. Said board may authorize and direct the performance of any of the ministerial duties of said board by officers, agents, employees, contractors, and employees of contractors duly detailed or employed by the Commissioners of said District for that purpose. Said board, the members thereof, and all persons acting under its authority and by its direction may, between the hours of 8 o'clock a. m. and 5 o'clock p. m., enter into and upon any and all lands and buildings in said District for the purpose of inspecting the same, and for the purpose of causing any such buildings to be vacated, demolished and removed, as may be required by the provisions of this act. Said board shall report its operations to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia from time to time as said Commissioners direct. Said Commissioners shall furnish said board such assistance as may be required for the proper conduct of its work, by details from various departments and offices of the government of said District.

The following committee amendments were read:

Page 2, line 7, strike out the words "and by its direction."

Page 2, strike out all commencing with the word "and" at the end of line 10 down to and including the word "act" in line 13.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendments offered by the committee.

The question was taken; and the committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill as amended be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

LOTS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 15961) to quiet title to certain lots in the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, the bill is reported by substitute, and I ask that the substitute be read instead of the original bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the amendment in the nature of a substitute be read in lieu of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, we have so little order that I can not hear.

The CHAIRMAN. This is the bill H. R. 15961, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] asks unanimous consent that the amendment in the nature of a substitute be read by the Clerk.

Mr. SIMS. What bill is it?

Mr. BABCOCK. It is the gentleman's substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] object?

Mr. SIMS. No; I only wanted to hear what was going on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the substitute.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments joint resolution of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. J. Res. 141. Joint resolution for the further relief of sufferers from earthquake and conflagration on the Pacific coast.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 15910. An act to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate commutation for good conduct for United States prisoners," approved June 21, 1902.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. ORVILLE HITCHCOCK PLATT, late a Senator from the State of Connecticut.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

LOTS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States hereby relinquishes all of its right and title in and to certain pieces or parcels of land in the District of Columbia known as lot 8, in block 1 of Meridian Hill, and lots 70 and 71, in the subdivision of the south grounds of Columbian University.

The following committee amendment was read:

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to relinquish title to certain lots in the District of Columbia."

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I will try and make a statement in reference to this bill, as the member of the committee who reported it is not present. This is one of those cases where the private parties have paid taxes on the property and been in undisputed possession for something like one hundred years—property to which the Government makes no claim. The United States attorney makes a full and complete report, in which he says the Government makes no claim, or has none, but that in the disposition of the property that the parties are trying to make it is a small cloud on their title. And the bill was reported by the committee to relinquish, not to any particular person, but any right the Government might have. I move the amendment be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] moves that the amendment reported by the committee be adopted.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill as amended be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I notice that the assessor of the District of Columbia states that one of these parcels is a piece of land that somebody claims by "right of discovery," and that he has been paying taxes on it ever since. Now, he claims title to the land, and this bill provides that the Government shall release its interest and vest title to the land in the persons now in possession. How does anybody get title to land in the District of Columbia by "right of discovery?"

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], who is entirely familiar with the matter, as the member of our committee who made the report [Mr. TAYLOR] is absent.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. May I ask the gentleman from New York what the question was?

Mr. FITZGERALD. A letter from the assessor of the District of Columbia states that—

Many years ago Mr. Robert C. Fox claimed this land by right of discovery, and for a long time it was designated on our records as "Fox's discovery."

It is proposed now that the United States shall release to the people succeeding to the title that was obtained by "discovery" the interest of the United States in this land.

Is it possible, if somebody goes out in the District of Columbia and discovers a piece of land and takes possession of it and pays taxes upon it, that thereafter the District Committee will recommend that the United States release whatever interest the United States has in that land to the discoverer of it? That seems to be what is purported to be done in this bill.

Mr. MANN. Was this discovery made subsequently to the discovery of America by Columbus?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope that the gentleman will not forget that Columbus discovered America.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, yes; Columbus discovered America; but that was some hundreds of years ago. It seems that some very enterprising gentleman, not at the time of Columbus, and not at any day given in this report, happened to discover in the District of Columbia a piece of property, and he went and got it put upon the tax rolls, and this property is listed as "Fox's discovery;" and now the District Committee comes in and suggests that Congress pass a bill relinquishing the right of the United States to this gentleman or his successors in this piece of land thus discovered in the District of Columbia. I wish some explanation of this bill before it is put through in this energetic manner.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Was there any objection by the aborigines out there? Were there any aborigines around? And was there any request to pay the expense of the discovery, too?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Before the gentleman proceeds I wish to read this further extract from the report of the assessor.

I have been unable to find any patent granted about the matter to Mr. Fox or anyone else by the United States for this land.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is this land worth? Has the gentleman from New York any idea?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It does not say. The taxes assessed for 1905, still unpaid, amount to $262.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. They are not due yet, and that does not have anything to do with this.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But it is an indication of what the land is worth.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Understanding something about the amount of taxes imposed in the District of Columbia, $15 on the thousand, it is very easy to figure out the value of this "discovery."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, if I understand correctly, the Government claims no interest in this land, and claims no title to it; and I do not care whether the gentleman got it by discovery, purchase, descent, or any other way. The material point is that the Government claims no interest in it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If somebody whose duty it was to look after the interest of the United States attempted to ascertain whether this particular piece of land was included in the land originally donated to the Federal Government for the purpose of establishing a seat of government here it might be ascertained that, although nobody was claiming it on the part of the United States, nevertheless the United States had title to it; and simply because nobody sets up such a claim on the part of the United States is no reason that we should relinquish, without knowing something about the rights of the Government, the title and interest that the Government may have in this particular piece of land.

Mr. DALZELL. I have just been informed that the parties who have been in possession of this land have been paying taxes for a hundred years.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The report of the assessor does not state that.

Mr. DALZELL. I am so informed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It appears to be in the name of William H. Lewis, executor and trustee, who acquired title from Alice S. Hill by will dated December 23, 1903, probated August 16, 1904.

Mr. DALZELL. Well, if it is true, it is true.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now, it does not go back; the title to this land does not go back, so far as we are informed. The record title is from 1902.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman permit me to explain the bill to him, or does he want any information?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should be very glad to have it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will say for the benefit of the gentleman, if he will look at the report that comes from the United States district attorney he will there discover that this property was donated to the District of Columbia and they made a transfer. There was some misdescription. Anyway, there was an old plat of the place on file that showed a road ran through a portion of this property. Now, it has been over a hundred years ago that the parties took possession of it, and for over fifty years there has been a building upon it, and the Government has received the taxes upon it ever since the District of Columbia was incorporated. I will say, further, for the information of the gentleman, that bills of this character have been passed to quiet the title of other pieces of property similarly situated. I will say also that the United States district attorney says that the Government has no title in this land.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have not had a chance to read his opinion.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. So does the corporation counsel say that the Government has no title.

Mr. SIMS. I was trying to suggest that the proper officers say that the Government has no title.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. They all say that the Government has no title.

Mr. DALZELL. If the gentleman will turn to page 3 of the report, he will find that the United States district attorney says that in his opinion the Government has no substantial interest in the property covered by said bill and can suffer no loss by appropriately quitclaiming all right and title it may presumably have therein to the party or parties having an otherwise good and perfect title thereto, and furthermore, that there are no taxes in arrears.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I call the attention of the House to the report of the assessor of the District.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Where he states about the taxes, and says they are not due.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are all paid, I understand, up to next May.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. All are paid that are due. This property has passed into the hands of an administrator. Substantial buildings have been erected on this property for a number of years, the administrator has it in his hands, there are debts against the estate, and he wants to dispose of it, and this is the only cloud there is upon the title. The Government has been receiving taxes on this particular piece of property for a hundred years.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, that may be, but I simply call the attention of the committee to that part of the report that I have been able to examine in the hurry of this proceeding, and the assessor says specifically that the property was carried on the tax books as "Fox's discovery." Now, when the gentleman says the Government has received the taxes, he means that the taxes have been paid to the District of Columbia.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman has time to examine the rest of the report, he will see that it is stated very elaborately——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will be glad to have the gentleman state it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I have tried to state it, but it is stated in detail on page 4 of the report.

Mr. WALDO. On page 4 you will find an abstract showing that the whole difficulty arises from a question as to how the old road ran. If the old road ran straight, then the Government has no interest whatever in it. If the old road ran with a crook, there would be a little elbow where the lot is situated. It has been in the possession of other people since 1792.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. There was a plat filed with the committee.

Mr. WALDO. It is stated right there in the report.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This report says that this property has been listed for taxation since 1874—not over one hundred years, but since 1874—and that about $3,700 in taxes, besides the assessment for special improvements, have been paid on the property. Now, at the rate at which real estate is taxed in this city, this property is worth between $15,000 and $20,000, and if the Government has any good claim to the property it should be enforced, or if its claim is of any value, and it is to be released, it should be paid for, whatever its interest is worth.

Mr. HEPBURN. Let them go to the Court of Claims.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. As I said to the gentleman a while ago, the officer whose duty it is to pass upon this question—the United States district attorney—says that the Government has no interest in the property.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The corporation counsel says:

> I am unable to make any decision from the report of the assessor in this case as to what ought to be done in the premises, but Mr. F. W. McReynolds has examined the title to this property and has furnished me with memoranda showing the various conveyances, which I transmit herewith as part of this report. Assuming the report of Mr. McReynolds to be correct, I have no hesitation in saying that there can be no objection to this bill.
> In this connection, however, it seems to me proper to say that some summary proceeding ought to be provided by legislation which will enable claimants against the United States to proceed in the supreme court of the District of Columbia to perfect titles needing correction of record under similar circumstances.

Now, the corporation counsel does not assume to state that the title to this property is good, but assuming that somebody else's report is correct, then there could be no objection to the bill. I would imagine that the committee, instead of reporting this bill, would have adopted the suggestion of the corporation counsel and reported a bill that would have enabled this question to be determined in a judicial proceeding.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

I would suggest that the United States district attorney is the proper official, and if you will permit me I will read from the report what he says.

> Peters, and his heirs after him—

And that was in 1792 that Peters conveyed it to the District—

> Peters, and his heirs after him, and all subsequent owners have likewise so construed said deed, having held and possessed the land lying north of what was in truth said road, including these lots, and have never been disturbed by the assertion of any rights on the part of the Government or any of its officials.

Now, that is more than a hundred years ago.

> Taxes, both general and special, have regularly from that time to this been levied upon these lots and paid by the owners.
> I therefore am of the opinion that the Government has no substantial interest in the property covered by said bill, and can suffer no loss by appropriately quitclaiming all right and title it may presumably have therein to the party or parties having an otherwise good and perfect title thereto.
> You also request a statement of the amount of unpaid taxes and assessments, if any, standing against these premises. I am advised by the tax collector of this District that there are no arrears of taxes upon this property.
> The copy of said bill is herewith returned.

This is the man whose duty it is to pass on the title. It was submitted to the corporation counsel, although it was not his duty to pass upon it when the Government is a party. I submitted it out of abundant caution myself to both gentlemen, although it was not necessary.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I simply called attention to the point as stated in the report. The whole difficulty seems to be, according to the report of this Assistant Attorney-General, that Peters conveyed to the trustees in charge of the subdivision of the city of Washington "all his land lying south of the Georgetown and Bladensburg road."

As a matter of fact, the road was supposed to run straight, but instead of that it made a bend, and while he apparently conveyed a certain tract, the trustees of the District only took possession of a part of what was actually conveyed.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman whether there is a doubt whether the land was included in the grant by Peters to the District of Columbia?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The Attorney-General's Office says that the Government has no claim on it and makes no claim on it.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. As I understand, the question involved here is as to whether this land was embraced in the land conveyed by Peters to the Government of the United States for the purposes of the District of Columbia. Now, it seems that Peters and those who claimed under him construed his conveyance not to embrace this land. Is that correct or not?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I can read what the report says in the deed.

Pursuant to this agreement, Robert Peters, an original proprietor, in 1792 conveyed all his land lying south of the Georgetown and Bladensburg road to said Commissioners. Upon an old official plat then extant this road is shown to run through what is now the property described in said House bill No. 15961. In fact, though, said road, as used from time immemorial, lay south of the road shown on said plat, its northern line being the southern line of the property in question. Florida avenue is the northern boundary of the city of Washington, and as it is in reality what was then in fact the old Georgetown and Bladensburg road, it will be seen that the northern limit of the city at this point was at the time of the deed aforesaid the old Georgetown and Bladensburg road and not the road appearing on the plat above mentioned.

In this deed Peters describes the land conveyed as all that lying south of the Georgetown and Bladensburg road, and then follows a description by metes and bounds which takes in all the land lying south of said road as laid out on said plat, and thus, through this ambiguous description, there appears upon the land records a possible interest of the Government in the property set out in said bill, and to this extent the title of the owners is clouded.

But inasmuch as it was the clear intention of all parties concerned that the Commissioners should only take title to such land as laid within the limits of the proposed "Federal City," it would appear that the intent of said deed was only to convey the land lying south of what was in fact the Georgetown and Bladensburg road and the northern boundary of the city.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. If you are governed by the rules of the deed, it included the land in the conveyance to the Government, taking the road as a boundary.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If you take the road as a boundary, it did not include this land; if you take it by metes and bounds, it did.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Fox and those who claimed under him have construed this land as being without the deed made by Peters to the Government?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. And the Government itself has acquiesced in that construction?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The Government has always acquiesced in the construction placed upon it by the owners, and the owners have had possession of it all the time.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that this came in first as a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to make a direct conveyance, and it was stated to be a bill to quiet title. I objected to that because the Government claimed no title and had no title to it. It now is simply a bill to relinquish title. I do not care whether the Government has ever conveyed this land or not. It was thought so and understood so for over a hundred years. Now, if the Government had a clear title to it, I do not think this Congress would think about exercising it at this time against private individuals who have had control of it for a hundred years, thinking that the title was in them. This is merely a matter of relinquishment, and I think it ought to be relinquished, for the Government never claimed any title, and it was so understood by people who occupied the land for a hundred years.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Well, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if he believes that if some individuals take possession of land belonging to the Government of the United States, and the Government takes no action to dispossess them of it, and it goes along and the people get the use of it all of this time, that that is any reason why we should give them the absolute title to it?

Mr. SIMS. No; not if they were mere trespassers. The intention in this case was to convey it, and it was so understood by the officials of the Government, and it was subsequently so treated and acted upon ever since. There was no trespass intended and no trespass in fact.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is not the gentleman from Tennessee mistaken in his statement when he says that it was the intention to convey the land, and that in fact the land was conveyed to the Government, and if it was the intention to convey it to the Government, and it was in fact conveyed to the Government, then the title was and is in the Government? The people may have been construing it so that it was not intended to convey it to the Government. As a matter of fact the property was not listed for taxes until 1874.

Mr. SIMS. What I intended to say was that the Government made no claim to it. The Government has no title to it and does not claim it. Private individuals have asserted title to it and have occupied it in pursuance of that claim.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How did they get title to it or get possession?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, that has already been explained, and it would take too long to go over it again.

Mr. BABCOCK. They bought the property years ago.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I want to know whether these people who have all these years been in possession of the property have held it adversely or amicably. Have they claimed it as their own, or have they recognized the title of the Government?

Mr. SIMS. My information is they claimed it absolutely as their own, and have been in absolute use and occupation of it by improvements and buildings.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Does not that ripen into a grant according to all the laws of all the States?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Not as against the Government.

Mr. SIMS. In Tennessee twenty years' possession presumes a grant.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Not as against the Government.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; it does as against the Government and the State, or it ought to if it does not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Whether a motion to recommit this bill, with instructions to the Committee on the District of Columbia to report a bill authorizing the supreme court of the District of Columbia to take jurisdiction of this matter and determine the question of title, has preference over the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] to lay the bill aside with a favorable recommendation?

The CHAIRMAN. The inquiry of the gentleman is whether a motion to recommit to the committee with instructions to make further investigation——

Mr. FITZGERALD. To report a bill on certain other lines?

Mr. BABCOCK. It is not in order at this time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to know whether it has precedence over the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

The CHAIRMAN. The inquiry of the gentleman from New York contemplates a general law?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; instructions to the committee to report the bill conferring jurisdiction upon the supreme court of the District of Columbia to hear and determine this particular case.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a different question.

Mr. BABCOCK. A motion to recommit would not be in order until we came to the passage of the bill. We are in the committee and not in the House.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I suppose the Committee of the Whole can make such recommendations to the House as it thinks proper. It seems to me that would be the reasonable thing, at least.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman's motion is pending, I will move to amend his motion by striking out the language "with a favorable recommendation" and substituting this language: "with the recommendation that the Committee on the District of Columbia shall report a bill conferring jurisdiction upon the supreme court of the District of Columbia to hear and determine the questions of title involved in this matter."

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman who they are going to sue if there is no adverse claim? Will he go before the court and represent the Government?

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair state the situation. The gentleman from New York moves that the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation be amended so that the bill be laid aside with the recommendation that it be referred back to the committee with instructions, and the Chair would hold that that motion is out of order, but he would entertain a motion of the gentleman from New York, taking precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, to lay it aside with the recommendation that it be referred to the committee with instructions. Now the gentleman from New York moves that this bill be reported with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia with instructions to report a bill referring this matter to the supreme court of the District of Columbia.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Conferring upon the supreme court of the District of Columbia jurisdiction to pass upon the questions involved.

The CHAIRMAN. With instructions to report a bill conferring upon the supreme court of the District of Columbia jurisdiction to determine the question involved in this bill, and that is the question before the committee at the present time. Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that motion is not in order. I will say briefly, Mr. Chairman, that the committee may understand just what is before it, this: In 1792 a tract of land was conveyed to the Federal Government by metes and bounds that carried it to a road which was supposed to go in a certain direction. As a matter of fact, the road as then used made a bend, and the only part of the property taken possession of by the Government was that part up to the road as then laid out. Other persons took possession of the land the other side of the road and up to the point where it was supposed to run, and they held possession of it, and not until 1874 was that property listed for taxation. Since that time it has been listed for taxation.

Now, it is claimed that the Government has concurred in the construction of the original deed, that it was only intended to convey the land up to the road as laid out at that time. The corporation counsel does not say that the title is good, but he says that if a certain report be correct he would have no objection to the bill.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRAHAM. Is a motion to lay upon the table debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand that the motion to lay on the table is pressed.

Mr. GRAHAM. But the gentleman from Wisconsin moved that this motion be laid on the table.

Mr. BABCOCK. I withdrew that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He could not make that motion if he wished to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that debate upon the pending motion is, in the opinion of the Chair, proceeding by unanimous consent; that when action is taken upon the motion that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation it is ordinarily after debate has been entirely exhausted upon the proposition, and the Chair is of opinion the motion of the gentleman from New York is in practically that parliamentary situation, and debate is now proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Tennessee stated he wished to make a statement in opposition to the motion, and suggested that I make a brief statement in favor of it. That is the only thing——

Mr. BABCOCK. I will be glad to hear it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now, the corporation counsel, in his statement, suggests just the procedure I have asked the committee to adopt—that the supreme court of the District be given jurisdiction to determine this question. It is one that should be determined by a judicial proceeding, because it involves the construction of a deed to property. If the Government has no title, or has asserted no title, or desires to assert no title, the title of those who hold the property will be clear.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Let me ask the gentleman a question. I think your motion is a very proper motion if the facts are as I understand them. You would have to give by a statute the party who claims the land the right to sue, because you can not sue the Government like an individual. That is the point of your proposition as I understand it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And if the Government after further investigation ascertains and determines that it has a claim that it wishes to assert it can then assert it in this proceeding and the court can determine the amount of compensation that should be awarded to the Government in order to have its right in this land extinguished. I suggest that is a fair and proper way of conducting this proceeding.

Mr. MANN. Let me ask the gentleman, is there any difficulty in obtaining a decision of the court in regard to this title? If these parties are in possession it is a very easy matter for the Government to bring suit against them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That will be a matter of detail in the bill itself which is to be drawn up by the committee.

Mr. MANN. I know, but the Government does not require a bill, I understand, to sue a man in possession of a piece of property claiming title to it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Government is not asking for anything. Here these parties claim title to the land and are asking the Government to relinquish something.

Mr. MANN. The Government would have to ask something if it set up a claim to the title, and if it wishes to make the claim to the title, why does it not bring suit?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This bill would give the right to the holder of the property to institute a suit and to have the title to the property cleared up.

Mr. MANN. I understand that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They do that to remove a cloud from the title.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If these people have a claim they think valid and proper, they should be given an opportunity to have the title to the land cleared up by a judicial proceeding.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman, the question of title is between the party who claims and the Government, as I understand it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. One or the other has the title. The Government has not asserted its title, and you wish to give the other party the right to commence a suit to assert title; but can not the law officers of the Government determine as well without a suit being instituted whether in their opinion the Government has the title or not, and, if in their opinion the Government has title, let the Government institute proceedings? It does not require an act of Congress to do that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The trouble is this, that this land was unquestionably conveyed to the Government, but it did not take possession of it. Others have taken possession of it, and from 1792 until 1874 no taxes were paid upon it. It was then listed in the tax book as a "discovery," and since 1874 the persons in possession have paid taxes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. From what time did the gentleman state no taxes had been paid?

Mr. MANN. Up to 1874.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. According to this report it has been paid since 1792.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will call the gentleman's attention to the statement of Mr. McReynolds, on page 4, in which he states that it was listed for taxation in 1874, and in 1883 Fox subdivided it, and then in the assessor's report he made the statement——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It does not say there were any taxes paid upon it before that, but it was listed at that time. I ask——

Mr. FITZGERALD. He says that for many years Mr. Fox claimed this land by right of discovery, and for a long time it was designated on their records as "Fox's discovery;" so that unquestionably before 1874 it was not listed for taxation, and if it were not listed, assuredly no taxes were paid upon it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman is wrong in his statement. At that time it was listed in his name as a subdivision of that property.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. It says that $3,700 has been paid in taxes, exclusive of special assessments, and the taxes for next year, due in May, are $262. And it is very apparent from the total taxes paid and from the amount levied for one year that there were not any taxes paid prior to 1874. I have said, Mr. Chairman, all I wish to say on this motion.

Mr. MANN. I wish the gentleman would try to make clear to the committee that if the United States has any claim at all to this property its law officers ought to know it, and if they do know it they ought to investigate it when the question is called before them. If upon their investigation they think the Government has title, it is their duty to institute a proceeding against the parties in possession. If upon their investigation they think the Government has no title and no chance of title, why should these parties be put to the expense of a suit?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me read what Mr. McReynolds says.

Mr. MANN. I do not pretend to say there has not been sufficient investigation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He said:

> It will thus be seen that if the description by natural objects is to govern, then Lewis has an absolutely good title; but if the description by metes and bounds is to govern, then he has a good possessory title as against the Peter heirs, but the United States has a possible claim to every other lot in a possible subdivision of the land south of the dotted line "A–B." Considering, though, that they have slept on such possible rights for one hundred and fourteen years, and accepted taxes thereon for thirty-two years, and allowed the lots to be improved under a duly issued permit, equity would require that the present owners should not be disturbed and that the title be quieted in the manner sought.

Mr. MANN. On that statement does not the gentleman think the Government ought to release any title it had to this piece upon payment of an estimated amount of the taxes from the original time down to 1874?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would not say that.

Mr. MANN. This property was increasing in value by reason of the increase of population here without the payment of taxes. Why should it not be taxed for that period of time?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I say this, that from this report it is clear, in my judgment, that the Government has some interest.

If it has no interest, that would be determined and the title would be clear. If it has an interest these people should compensate the Government for the relinquishment of that interest.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this motion to refer this back to the committee and have a suit brought. The suit would be tried upon technical principles—upon deeds and conveyances, etc. The Government having slept on its rights for one hundred and fourteen years, and received taxes since 1874—thirty-two years ago—and private individuals having occupied this land and improved it in good faith and not as trespassers, I think it would be the next thing to highway robbery to take this property away from them on ever so good a legal title.

Now, suppose you send it to the courts and the courts decided that the Government does have an interest there, the clear legal title. What would be the result? There would be a bill to release it just as this is, and what is the use of sending it to the court and having the expense of a lawsuit to ascertain whether possibly the Government has the pure legal title. I am opposed to the motion. I think the bill ought to pass. This great Government is not that bad off for a little piece of land, especially when it has been collecting taxes on it for over thirty-two years.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York, that this bill be laid aside with a recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions to report a bill conferring upon the supreme court of the District of Columbia jurisdiction to hear and determine the rights of the parties involved.

The question was taken; and the motion was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. BABCOCK. I move that the committee rise temporarily.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LITTLEFIELD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration sundry bills reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia, and had, with the exception of two, come to no resolution thereon.

FURTHER RELIEF FOR SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House joint resolution 141, making appropriation for aid to the people of San Francisco, with Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House joint resolution 141, for the further relief of sufferers from earthquake and conflagration on the Pacific coast, with Senate amendments, which the Clerk will report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman inform the House what the effect of the amendments will be?

Mr. TAWNEY. The effect of one of the amendments of the Senate will be to increase the appropriation from $1,000,000 to $1,500,000. The effect of the other amendment will be to enable the War Department to defray the expense of administering these appropriations for the relief of the people in San Francisco and neighboring cities, amounting in the aggregate to $2,500,000, out of this appropriation, instead of paying such expense out of the general current appropriations for the Department.

The question was taken; and the amendments of the Senate were concurrend in.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Mr. BABCOCK. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of District business.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. LITTLEFIELD in the chair.

SALARIES OF SCHOOL-TEACHERS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I call up for consideration the bill H. R. 18442, and I request that the first reading of this bill be dispensed with, and that it be read under the five-minute rule for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin calls up the bill H. R. 18442, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18442) to fix and regulate the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the board of education of the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the further reading of this bill be dispensed with.

Mr. WILLIAMS. To that request I must object.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair first state the request.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It does not make any difference, if it is a request for unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi objects to any request for unanimous consent, and the Clerk will read:

The bill was read at length.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BLACKBURN). The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have read an amendment, which I will offer at the proper place. I ask now that it be read from the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the proposed amendment in the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 25, after the word "schools," insert as follows: "Provided, That the appointment, promotion, or dismissal of all white officers, teachers, and employees shall be made by the white members of the board of education, and that the appointment, promotion, transfer, or dismissal of all colored officers, teachers, and employees shall be made by the colored members of the board of education."

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a short statement in connection with the bill which has just been reported, and also, as the sections of the bill are read under the five-minute rule, to offer some few amendments in the line of economy. I will say that the committee had some five bills on the subject of education, and gave them very careful consideration. Hearings were had, amounting to eighteen or twenty, and all lasting a long time. Everybody who desired to come before the committee was given an opportunity to be heard, and due consideration was given to the testimony that they gave. While it was the first impression of the members of the committee that a radical change was necessary in the school management of the District, yet, as the hearings progressed and the testimony was presented, we came to the conclusion that a sweeping change was not wise.

The one point, however, which seems to the committee to be of the most importance was the raising of the salaries of the school-teachers. The low rate of salaries which at present teachers receive in the District has resulted in the withdrawal of teachers of excellence who have been developed in our school system. They have been taken from us—from the city of Washington—to accept higher salaries in other cities of the country. To maintain the system at the point of excellence which was deemed but proper in the national capital of the country, the committee came to the conclusion that the salaries of the teachers ought to be raised at least to equal those which similar teachers of similar duties were given in other cities.

Another point which was brought very direct to the attention of the committee was the fact that there were a number of half-day schools, or, rather, pupils who only received half-day schooling above the second grade.

On investigation these were found to number 1,600, and the committee were of the opinion that this was not as it should be.

The committee then took up the question of the board of education, and it was deemed wise to increase their number to nine and to make their term of service three years instead of seven years, as it is at present, the members of the board going out three at the end of each year, thus having a rotation in the board. It was also deemed wise, in view of the increase in the membership of the board, that three members of that board should be of the colored race, there being in the present board two of the seven of the colored race. It was also deemed wise to limit the number of women on the board to three.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman permit a question in that connection?

Mr. MORRELL. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I notice you provide that there shall be three members of the board who shall be of the colored race.

Mr. MORRELL. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. That would make it obligatory always to have three colored members of the board, as I take it.

Mr. MORRELL. That was the idea of the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not finding fault with the committee at all in that respect, but it seems to me, as you have it now, the board might be composed entirely of colored members, but could not be all of the white race. Do you not think it would be advisable, if you are going to provide that they can not all be of the white race, to provide also that they can not all be of the colored race?

Mr. MORRELL. I accept the suggestion of the gentleman, and if he will prepare such an amendment to that section as he thinks will make it more clear, I will be very glad to accept it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question or two for information.

Mr. MORRELL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. On page 5, in classifying the salaries, I see that in class 1 the highest salary in $600; in class 2 the lowest salary is $600. The highest salary in class 2 is $700 and the lowest salary in class 3 is $650. Now, how does it happen that you have somebody in class 2 at the same salary that you have in class 1, or even at a smaller salary, and how does it happen that you have somebody in class 2 with a higher salary than somebody in class 3? And that peculiar feature runs throughout the entire classification.

Mr. MORRELL. In answer to the gentleman, I will say that the classification was arranged in this way so as not to discriminate against the teachers who taught the lower classes. That was the idea of the committee.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. GOULDEN. Go ahead.

Mr. MORRELL. I yield to the question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. On page 2, beginning with line 20, the sum and substance of it is that no appointment, promotion, and so forth, shall be made by the board of education except upon the written recommendation of the superintendent of schools.

Mr. MORRELL. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If that is to be the modus operandi, why not permit the superintendent of schools to make these appointments and promotions himself?

Mr. MORRELL. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that the practice which is in vogue at present is the same as outlined in the bill—that all recommendations for appointments as teachers are made by the superintendent of schools; but while that has been supposed to be the practice, in some instances the reverse has been the case, and it was thought better that all recommendations should come from the superintendent of schools, for the reason that he is responsible for the teaching force under him.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If that is the case, why not put it in the bill that the superintendent shall make these appointments, transfers, promotions, and so forth, without any operation of the board of education whatever?

Mr. MORRELL. There may be one, two, three, four, five, or six different applicants eligible for a position. The superintendent of schools submits these applications to the board indorsing certain of them. The board investigates and takes into consideration the qualifications of the different individuals indorsed by the superintendent, and then acts upon the judgment of its members. In the opinion of the committee it would not be wise that one individual should have the power of making the selections for all the teachers in the schools.

Mr. GOULDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman how the schedule of salaries compares with those in cities of like population throughout the country?

Mr. MORRELL. The schedule of salaries in vogue in other cities of a like size of Washington compare favorably with the schedules submitted. As the bill proceeds, in taking up the salaries, I can explain that more fully.

Mr. GOULDEN. Another question: The bill provides that there shall be three of the colored race. How did the committee arrive at that particular number?

Mr. MORRELL. That was arrived at in view of the population of the city of Washington being in the ratio of 2 to 1. We thought that they should have a representative upon that basis.

Mr. GOULDEN. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the gentleman's attention to a section of the bill with a view of getting an explanation. It is a section that it seems to me will lead to a good deal of trouble. It is in relation to the appointment of a superintendent. It provides that the board of education shall appoint the superintendent, but it fixes no term for the superintendent. There is no provision in this bill for the removal of the superintendent, and it seems to me that that provision is liable to result in a good deal of friction and controversy. I know something about the experience that has been had in counties and cities in the western or in the middle part of the country respecting the term and tenure of the superintendent of schools, and it occurred to me that there ought to be fixed a term of employment and perhaps a maximum of period under which a contract might be made. The right to remove for cause, it seems to me, ought to be provided for in the bill.

There is nothing in the bill authorizing the board of education to get rid of an unsatisfactory superintendent, and this bill confers upon the superintendent of schools a very large power. No teacher can be appointed or transferred or promoted, except upon his written recommendation. Now, did the committee have in mind the possibility of a controversy arising over the power to remove a superintendent?

Mr. MORRELL. The committee were of opinion that that power was vested in the board without so specifically stating it. However, if the gentleman from Indiana thinks that the bill would be improved and strengthened by limiting the term of the superintendent, and specifically giving the board the power to remove, the committee will accept such an amendment.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I had an impression that such limitations would improve the bill. I thought perhaps the committee may have had reasons why these limitations ought not to have been incorporated in it. I fear that this section, as it now stands, may result in a good deal of difficulty in the future. The power of the board over the superintendent, I think, ought to be contained in the bill, and there ought to be some term fixed for the superintendent.

Mr. MORRELL. As I say, the committee is quite prepared to accept any such suggestion or any draft of an amendment which will strengthen the bill in that particular.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the part of the bill beginning on the twentieth line of the second page:

> No appointment, however, promotion, transfer, or dismissal of any director, supervising principal, head of department, teacher, or any other subordinate to the superintendent of the schools shall be made by the board of education except upon the written recommendation of the superintendent of schools.

It seems to me that that operates as a limitation upon the power of the board to remove the superintendent. I do not believe that they have the power under the statute.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And it seems that the tenure is perpetual. There is no limitation upon him if the board has no power to remove him.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question about the very point that he is on now. Would it not be better either to fix the power to promote, transfer, etc., entirely in the board or entirely in the superintendent?

Mr. MORRELL. I would like to answer the gentleman in this way: As will be seen from the report, it was intimated, and very strongly intimated, that members of the board had in several instances, as it were, gone over the head of the superintendent of schools and had interfered in matters of actual school discipline, and the result was that the habit had grown up for the teachers, instead of going to the superintendent of schools, to go over the head of the superintendent and the assistant superintendent to the members of the board of education itself, and for that reason the committee thought that it would strengthen the hands of the superintendent and make him really what he is—the head of the teaching board—and that it would strengthen his discipline, if that was not possible hereafter.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, suppose this sort of case, which is liable to arise: That the superintendent and the board of education get at loggerheads. Then the superintendent apparently has the power of nominating and the board of education has the power of confirming.

Mr. MORRELL. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They can reject his nominations as much as they please.

Mr. MORRELL. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then it ends at last in their compelling him to send in the names they want, does it not?

Mr. MORRELL. Not necessarily. I do not see why that should follow.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Suppose the board just simply loll back and say, "We reject this person," and then he sends in another name, and they reject that, and they keep on rejecting his nominations, which is practically notice to him that unless he nominates somebody they want they will not confirm him?

Mr. MORRELL. That might be said of the recommendations that come from the President of the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is just exactly what happens in the United States Senate every day. They make a log-rolling business over there, and compel the President to nominate certain persons whom they want.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is it not at last necessary that the board shall control ultimately in the management of the schools of the District?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; I think that is correct.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, then, if they have ample power to remove the superintendents, is not that a sufficient weapon or instrument in their hands to compel the superintendent to do what he ought to do?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, if the gentleman will permit me, without giving the names, because I do not want to advertise a fuss that seems to have been settled, I would state that last summer there was a prolonged investigation here about one of the principals of the schools. They first removed him—and I do not express any opinion whatever about the merits of the controversy—and said he should not be principal of that school. Then, in less than ten days, my recollection is—anyway, in a comparatively short time—they got together again and reinstated him. If that kind of process can go on, it means utter demoralization in the schools of Washington. That controversy should have been settled in a week instead of consuming months.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I suppose if they did wrong in the removal the least they could do was to put him back. I do not know anything about the case.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] another question. This bill provides for a superintendent. It then provides for two assistant superintendents. On page 4, beginning with line 7, it provides for a supervisor of high schools. On page 6, beginning with line 20, it provides for "head teachers" and "heads of departments." The question I want to ask, based on those statements, is, Is not the public school system in the District of Columbia liable to become top-heavy? If you have so many superintendents and assistant superintendents and supervisors and heads of departments and heads of schools, is it not liable to become top-heavy?

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman I may say that the bill in nowise increases the present organization of the schools, nor does it add to the supervision in any way, shape, or form. It is exactly as the present law is to-day.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, may I say I thoroughly agree with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], and introduced a bill to cover that very point? I thought the system was top-heavy, based upon a long experience in connection with schools, but I realize this fact, that we can not get all at once.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know that.

Mr. GOULDEN. Therefore it was a compromise measure, and I have agreed to support the bill because it is a compromise measure.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania explain what is the method proposed as to promotions—whether it is intended to be optional at the recommendation of the school superintendent or whether it is compulsory?

Mr. MORRELL. Once in a class it is automatic within that class.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand that every teacher will receive an additional allowance in the way of promotion each year of service until the teacher receives the highest amount in the particular class in which she is serving?

Mr. MORRELL. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then what is the purpose of that provision found at the bottom of page 2 which reserves in the superintendent of schools the right to recommend promotion? If there is to be a compulsory promotion wherein will the discretion be exercised that is vested in the superintendent as found in that clause?

Mr. MORRELL. That refers to the transfer from one class to another.

Mr. STAFFORD. The phraseology is broad enough to include all promotions, because it says that no appointment, promotion, etc., shall be made except upon the recommendation of the superintendent of schools.

Mr. MORRELL. Yes; but that is modified by sections later on, as the gentleman will see when we come to them.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman, further, what is the present rule as to increases of salaries of teachers?

Mr. MORRELL. There is no present rule at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do they receive any promotion in the way of increase of salary?

Mr. MORRELL. No; a certain amount of money is appropriated, as the gentleman will remember, by the appropriation bill each year, stating how many teachers and appropriating a lump sum. Now, for instance, there were 120 teachers at $1,000 a year, 22 teachers at $950 a year, 40 teachers at $950 a year, and 40 teachers at $900 a year, and so on; 220 at $600. At the present time there is no real system of increasing the salaries of the teachers.

Mr. STAFFORD. Have there been many resignations from the teaching force during the past prior years by reason of inadequacy of salary?

Mr. MORRELL. The resignations from the teaching force for the last few years will be found on page 6 of this report, and the gentleman will see the number of high school teachers who have left Washington to accept better pay. There were about 1,200 teachers in the Washington elementary schools. During the past fifteen years eighteen teachers in the elementary schools have left Washington to accept better pay elsewhere. There are about 200 teachers in the Washington high schools. During the past fifteen years forty-eight high school teachers have left Washington to accept better pay. Twenty-one have left in the past three years. The average salary vacated was $1,083; the average salary received was $2,023.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman furnish any figures or statistics as to the number of resignations in the graded schools?

Mr. MORRELL. The number of resignations in the graded schools, I think, as far as I remember, were not quite as many as from the high schools.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, these resignations may be for other causes than inadequacy of salary.

Mr. MORRELL. No; they were practically on account of salary. Now, I will say to the gentleman, if he does not object to my reading this statement, in Washington the salary paid to principals of high schools, including the manual training schools, is $1,800 a year, which is next to the lowest; that is in a total of some fifty-odd cities, and there is no graded advance according to experience. The lowest average for both men and women was $800, paid in Washington; for men alone, Washington is still the lowest in that list of cities.

Mr. STAFFORD. Right there, if the chairman has the figures before him, can he give us statistics of the highest salaries or average salaries that are paid in the various cities of the size of Washington to teachers of the fifth, sixth, and seventh grades? In this bill you provide a maximum of $1,100 for teachers in those grades.

Mr. MORRELL. That is rather difficult to do. I have some figures here which may be in answer to the gentleman. Now, for instance, take the matter of principals to which I have just referred——

Mr. STAFFORD. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I am calling attention to the salaries of the teachers in the fifth, sixth, and seventh grades. The bill provides for salaries in those grades ranging from $800 up to $1,100, and, as I understand the gentleman, they will receive an annual increase each year until they reach the maximum of $1,100.

Mr. MORRELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. STAFFORD. And it requires ten years' service in reaching the maximum. Now, can the gentleman give me any city in which teachers in the grades of fifth, sixth, and seventh are receiving as high a maximum salary or an average salary of $1,100?

Mr. MORRELL. In Milwaukee they get $1,700.

Mr. STAFFORD. Seventeen hundred dollars for teachers in the fifth, sixth, and seventh grades? I beg to question that statement.

Mr. MORRELL. Excuse me; that was principals: I got the wrong line. In San Francisco they get $1,200. In Boston——

Mr. STAFFORD. Are you now referring to salaries in the fifth, sixth, and seventh grades?

Mr. MORRELL. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do they all receive that, or does an exceptional teacher receive that as a maximum salary?

Mr. MORRELL. No; that is the average—that is, as far as I could make an average for those teachers.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, as I understand you, from your statement the average pay of teachers in San Francisco in those three grades is $1,200, but some receive less and some more? Can the gentleman give the maximum salary paid in San Francisco in the fifth, sixth, and seventh grades?

Mr. MORRELL. I have not got that.

Mr. STAFFORD. There must be some receiving still higher than $1,200, if that is the average.

Mr. MORRELL. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give figures in other cities?

Mr. MORRELL. Principals in the grammar schools, for instance, in New York receive $3,500; teachers of the highest rank receive $2,400, and teachers of the lowest rank $900.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit me? He is not answering the question. He is giving figures as to the principals or chief of teachers in these respective schools. I would like to have the salaries of teachers in other cities who have in charge the fifth, sixth, and seventh grades, in which you provide a maximum of $1,100 after ten years of service that will be paid to all teachers, irrespective of their competency, and solely by reason of length of service.

Mr. MORRELL. In answer to the gentleman, I will say that the average for all the elementary teachers, for sixteen cities, is $676. This is at present. The lowest average being in New Orleans, $479, and the highest $941. Besides, many of them do not get the salary of $1,100 for having been in the service but ten years, many having been teaching a long time before this bill becomes a law. The bill, moreover, does not propose that any incompetent teacher shall remain in the service.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, your average is $941, I understand?

Mr. MORRELL. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here you are creating a maximum salary of $1,100.

Mr. BABCOCK. Not the average; the highest, he said.

Mr. MORRELL. Those are the elementary schools to which I have referred.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] to say that that was the average. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] says that it was the highest salary paid.

Mr. MORRELL. The average for sixteen cities is $676.

Mr. STAFFORD. Did you not mention a figure in the neighborhood of $900?

Mr. BABCOCK. That was the highest.

Mr. MORRELL. That was the highest.

Mr. STAFFORD. The highest average or the highest salary paid in those respective grades?

Mr. MORRELL. The lowest average being $479, in New Orleans; the highest average being $941, in Boston.

Mr. STAFFORD. What ground has the committee for recommending the large sum of $1,100, which all of these teachers will receive if they remain ten years in the service, for teaching the fifth, sixth, and seventh grades?

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman I can say that these tables of salaries were prepared by the board of education in conjunction with the superintendent of schools. They are practically the same salaries that were recommended in each one of the bills that were submitted to the committee. The committee went very carefully into this matter of increase, and I think it will be found that the increase asked for is only a just one.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, do I understand the committee has accepted without change the recommendation of the board of education so far as salaries are concerned?

Mr. MORRELL. No; the committee has not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Wherein has the committee made any change in the recommendations of the board so far as salaries are concerned?

Mr. MORRELL. It has made many changes in the recommendations made by the board of education and those contained in the bills under consideration.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has it made any change in the recommendations so far as the salaries of the teachers of these three grades—the fifth, sixth, and seventh—are concerned?

Mr. MORRELL. What those are exactly I can not say, offhand, but from my recollection of it the committee did.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give any figures showing the average pay at present of teachers in these three grades in the schools in Washington?

Mr. MORRELL. I will come to that after those schedules are read. I have all those figures here. It just simply delays the time of the gentleman. I can say this: Now, for instance, you take the matter of kindergartens. Kindergarten assistants at the present time, which come in class one, receive $450.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not criticising the salaries the bill provides for the kindergarten teachers, but I do believe that the maximum salary provided for teachers in these lower grades, the fifth, sixth, and seventh, are inordinately high, and I am trying to ascertain some data which justifies the committee in recommending that high increase. Can the gentleman give me the maximum salary paid at present to the teachers of the fifth, sixth, and seventh grades in Washington?

Mr. MORRELL. If the gentleman will turn to the tables in the report.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have a copy of the report.

Mr. MORRELL. If he will examine the tables which I prepared and which I have here he will find, for instance, that on page 68 it shows the table of salaries, placing the increases, the maximum increases and the maximum salary for the entire system. Now, take table 3; that shows increases for white schools. Table b, small, shows the table of salaries, placing the increases and the maximum increases for colored schools. Now, Table C on page 74 will show the increase in all of the different grades, if the gentleman will turn to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Was the gentleman just referring to page 68?

Mr. MORRELL. And page 74.

Mr. STAFFORD. Just prior thereto.

Mr. MORRELL. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman point out more specifically what table he was reading from. There are a good many table B's, as I find there—large B and small b.

Mr. MORRELL. The big B refers to the white schools and the small b refers to the colored schools.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are several small b's referred to on that page. Will the gentleman specify the table to which he is referring? He will find several small b's.

Mr. MORRELL. I do not understand the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. What do the tables on page 68 cover?

Mr. MORRELL. That shows the salaries, placing the increases, the maximum increase, and the maximum salaries.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does it show the salaries paid to the teachers of the fifth, sixth, and seventh grades?

Mr. MORRELL. Not on that page.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where can those figures be found?

Mr. MORRELL. That can be found on page 76.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give the committee the salaries that are now paid to the teachers of the fifth, sixth, and seventh grades?

Mr. MORRELL. On page 73 the gentleman will find Table 3 C, elementary schools, eighth grade, total number of officers and teachers, six and seventh grades, twenty. The total of salaries for the fiscal year of these eighth-grade teachers was $20,450. Now, the placing of increases provided for $6,010, and the total salaries, maximum after ten years, is $32,340. Now, so on, a little lower down, the gentleman will find fifth, sixth, and seventh.

Mr. STAFFORD. In what place will I find the average paid to each of these respective grades? I find the totals only.

Mr. MORRELL. If the gentleman will just divide the total by the number of teachers he will find the average.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not pretend to be a lightning calculator, but I believed the gentleman in charge of the bill would be able to give information as to the salaries now paid to these respective classes. The tables seem to be involved in a mass of uncertainty. I would like to find out something definite as to the pay of the teachers of these respective grades, and particularly those of the fifth, sixth, and seventh grades; and the gentleman can only refer me to the grand total, without any figures as to the average pay for each teacher.

Mr. RODENBERG. It gives the number of teachers.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Divide the total by the number of teachers and you have it.

Mr. MORRELL. Fifth-grade teachers get $700; sixth-grade teachers get $775; seventh-grade teachers get $825. Therefore the average, taking the highest and lowest and dividing by 3, equals $766.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is proposed to increase the salaries of those in the fifth grade from $700 in each instance to $1,100, those in the sixth grade from $775 to $1,100, and those in the seventh grade from $825 to $1,100?

Mr. MORRELL. That is after ten years' service, I may answer the gentleman. It is simply a reward that these teachers ought to get. The committee felt that after having been in service in the public schools of this District for that time, and many having been in the service many years before this bill will be enacted into law, that they ought to get a living salary.

Mr. STAFFORD. Without regard to the efficiency of their service?

Mr. MORRELL. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. RODENBERG. The superintendent is the judge as to their efficiency.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood the gentleman to say in the beginning that promotions were to be compulsory without regard to the action of the superintendent.

Mr. MORRELL. Oh, no; not without regard to efficiency. That never was contemplated.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand that these teachers are to receive annual increases or not?

Mr. MORRELL. This bill provides for a yearly increase in the salaries of teachers provided that they do their work as they should.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where is that provision?

Mr. BABCOCK. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. MORRELL. I have, and I have yielded to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BABCOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not think the teachers in Washington are entitled to equal compensation with the teachers in his own city of Milwaukee?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think so.

Mr. BABCOCK. Does the gentleman know that the salaries that the teachers of Milwaukee have been receiving are about 25 per cent more than those paid in Washington?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not believe any teachers in Milwaukee, in the fifth, sixth, and seventh grades, are receiving a maximum salary of $1,100.

Mr. BABCOCK. If the gentleman had taken time to read or look at the report he would have seen. Let me call his attention to the principals of the high schools in Milwaukee. They receive $2,400 and $2,500 a year, and in Washington $1,800.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have not been making any question about those.

Mr. BABCOCK (continuing). Elementary schools in Milwaukee, $1,700; in Washington, $1,000 and $1,200 a year. I would like to know what point the gentleman is trying to make. He is certainly willing that the teachers in this city shall have the same consideration that they have in our own State.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman had been listening, he would have found that I have been giving my attention particularly to the provision of the bill for the pay of the teachers of the fifth, sixth, and seventh grades; and I have been trying very assiduously to ascertain from the gentleman having the matter in charge what was the pay of the teachers of those grades in Washington; and I will now say to my colleague that in Milwaukee no salaries are paid as high as $1,100 to teachers in those grades, or anywhere else in the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. BABCOCK. High school teachers in Milwaukee, $1,700; in Washington, $1,200; elementary schools in Milwaukee—I suppose that includes the grades to which the gentleman refers——

Mr. BABCOCK. Page 7.

Mr. STAFFORD. Teachers of the highest rank, $900, as I find on page 7, I will inform the gentleman.

Mr. BABCOCK. That is in the elementary schools.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; the highest.

Mr. BABCOCK. And in Washington, $950. That is the only grade where they are equal in Washington.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has not advanced any reason why we should increase the compensation of the teachers in the fifth, sixth, and seventh grades to $1,100, and the gentleman can not cite the salaries paid to teachers in Milwaukee in confirmation thereof.

Mr. RODENBERG. Would the gentleman favor a proposition to have the salaries remain stationary, no matter how long and how efficient the services of the teachers?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have been trying to ascertain about two matters, one is whether this bill provides for compulsory promotions, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] at the outset suggested it did, leaving no discretion in anybody; the next, the basis which the committee had in fixing the maximum rate of $1,100 for teachers in the graded schools in the fifth, sixth, and seventh grades. Now, if the gentleman can show any city in the country where they are paying $1,100 to teachers in the fifth, sixth, and seventh grades——

Mr. BABCOCK. Does the gentleman understand that they have to serve for years before they reach that point?

Mr. STAFFORD. For ten years; and I understand that teachers in other cities are serving as long as that and longer.

Mr. BABCOCK. The initial salary is several hundred dollars less than that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Starting in at $800, and reaching $1,100 after ten years' service.

Mr. RODENBERG. That is not excessive, is it?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think $1,100 is, as compared to the salaries in other cities, and I now ask the gentlemen of the committee to refer to any city where they are receiving as high a salary as $1,100 a year in those grades.

Mr. COCKRAN. Before the gentleman answers I hope he will allow me to say if it be the actual fact that no city of this country pays better salaries to the teachers in its public schools than it is proposed to pay the teachers of Washington by this bill, I hope that fact will not be disclosed on this floor, to the discredit of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that the mere fact that there has been provided here a maximum of $1,100 for teachers in the District of Columbia could be any argument that that is the proper basis. We might just as well provide $1,500 or $2,000, and then say that that is a proper salary.

The question is, What should these teachers receive? What is a fair compensation for these teachers, considering their efficiency, their years of preparation? And in determining that we have a right to consider the salaries paid to teachers in other cities, because we have a right to say that other municipalities are just as regardful of the welfare of their teachers in the public schools as Congress is for the salaries of the teachers in the District of Columbia.

Mr. COCKRAN. I should like to ask if the gentleman who has just taken his seat considers the compensation provided in this bill would be excessive?

Mr. STAFFORD. I consider that the salary of $1,100 a year to teachers after ten years of service in the fifth, sixth, and seventh grades is a very high compensation.

Mr. COCKRAN. Excessive?

Mr. STAFFORD. That is merely a question of words.

Mr. COCKRAN. Oh, no; it is a question of fact. I hope it is high, and I also hope it is not excessive.

Mr. STAFFORD. I might even go to the extent of saying it is excessive, when compared with the salaries provided in this bill for the kindergarten teachers.

Mr. COCKRAN. You think it is?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is certainly high, and too high.

Mr. COCKRAN. If it is too high, surely it is excessive.

Mr. MORRELL. I might say, Mr. Chairman, that besides Providence, Newark, and Milwaukee, all the other cities mentioned in the tables on page 7 of the report, except Washington, show a higher rate of salaries for teachers. Now, in preparing this bill the committee tried to take in the justice of the situation, and tried to deal out justice to the teachers, whether they were teachers in the elementary schools, teachers of small children, or teachers in the high school—teachers of those beginning to realize the responsibilities of life. A teacher who spends his or her life and wears out his or her energy teaching small children, putting up with the annoyances of governing small children, is, Mr. Chairman, to my mind, just as much entitled to a living salary as the man who teaches the sciences and the higher grades of education in the high school. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] desires some time, and I will yield to him ten minutes.

[Mr. SIMS addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill be now closed and that the bill be taken up under the five-minute rule for amendment and discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that general debate be considered as now closed and that the bill be read under the five-minute rule. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the control of the public schools of the District of Columbia is hereby vested in a board of education, to consist of nine members, only three of whom shall be women, and of the nine members three shall be of the colored race, one of whom shall be a woman, and all of whom shall have been for five years immediately preceding their appointment bona fide residents of the District of Columbia. The members of the board of education shall be appointed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for terms of three years each, except that the original appointments under this act shall be as follows: Three for one year, three for two years, and three for three years, and members shall be eligible for reappointment. The members shall serve without compensation. Vacancies for unexpired terms, caused by death, resignation, or otherwise, shall be filled by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. The board shall meet for organization within thirty days after appointment. They shall appoint a secretary, who shall not be a member of the board, and they shall hold stated meetings at least once a month during the school year and such additional meetings as they may from time to time provide for. The organization meeting, and all meetings whatsoever thereafter, shall be open to the public, except committee meetings dealing with the character or appointment of teachers.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont and Mr. SIMS rose.

Mr. MORRELL. I would suggest that the Clerk finish the section.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee rise?

Mr. SIMS. To offer the amendment which I indicated.

Mr. MORRELL. I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that the Clerk finish the reading of the section first.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests that the section has not been read yet, and as soon as the reading of the section is finished the Chair will entertain the motion.

Mr. SIMS. I thought the section had been finished.

The Clerk read as follows:

No appointment, however, promotion, transfer, or dismissal of any director, supervising principal, principal, head of department, teacher, or any other subordinate to the superintendent of schools, shall be made by the board of education, except upon the written recommendation of the superintendent of schools.

The board shall determine all questions of general policy relating to the schools, shall appoint the executive officers hereinafter provided for, define their duties, and direct expenditures. All expenditures of public funds for such school purposes shall be made and accounted for as now provided by law under the direction and control of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. The board shall appoint all teachers in the manner hereinafter prescribed and all other employees provided for in this act.

The board of education shall annually, on the 1st day of October, transmit to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia an estimate in detail of the amount of money required for the public schools for the ensuing year, and said Commissioners shall transmit the same in their annual estimate of appropriations for the District of Columbia, with such recommendations as they may deem proper.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have my amendment read, which was pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was not aware the gentleman had presented an amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 25, after the word "schools," insert the following: "Provided, That the appointment, promotion, transfer, or dismissal of all white officers, teachers, and employees shall be made by the white members of the board of education, and that the appointment, promotion, transfer, or dismissal of all colored officers, teachers, and employees shall be made by the colored members of the board of education."

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I should like for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to give us the reason why he has submitted that amendment. It seems to me that it is practically creating two boards.

Mr. MORRELL. In answer to the gentleman——

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion? If the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee is carried, then we will not have anything to do with this amendment, will we?

Mr. MORRELL. Oh, yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I note his amendment provided——

Mr. MORRELL. Oh, yes; I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. NORRIS. Withdraw that amendment, and let the gentleman from Tennessee offer his amendment, and we can discuss that.

Mr. MORRELL. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee to offer his amendment first.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment temporarily. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend——

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I was recognized before.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he withdraw temporarily his amendment? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think I am recognized——

Mr. SIMS. Let the gentleman from Vermont offer his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. SIMS. I will yield to the gentleman from Vermont to offer his amendment to see what it is.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Tennessee yields to the gentleman from Vermont?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; to offer an amendment. I have not heard it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "members," in line 9, page 1, strike out everything down to the word "of," in line 4, page 2, and insert "all of whom shall have been for five years immediately preceding their appointment bona fide residents of the District of Columbia. The members of the board of education shall be appointed by the supreme court judges;" so that the passage will read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the control of the public schools of the District of Columbia is hereby vested in a board of education to consist of nine members, all of whom shall have been for five years immediately preceding their appointment bona fide residents of the District of Columbia. The members of the board of education shall be appointed by the supreme court judges of the District of Columbia for terms of three years each, except that the original appointments under this act shall be as follows:"

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, for the first time in many years we are undertaking to adopt some general legislation in behalf of the school system of the District of Columbia. I have pointed out in public and in private, at divers times for these many months, the fact, which is apparent to every citizen of this great country of ours who is at all familiar with the situation, that the schools of the city of Washington, the capital city of the nation—the only schools under the direct and absolute care and control of the National Government—ought to be object lessons for the rest of the country. In legislating, therefore, for the schools of Washington we have two motives. In the first place, there is the desire to do our best by the boys and girls who are dependent upon these schools for their education. And then there is the additional motive—the desire to show what the National Government can do when upon it is placed the responsibility of organizing and maintaining a system of public instruction. So to-day when we take up this bill for consideration we ought to determine for ourselves whether it lays the proper foundation for the system which we hope to construct. We ought to examine the bill and determine whether, if enacted into law, it will result in a system of which we may be justly proud. We should ask ourselves in all seriousness whether the bill in its present form provides for the very best school system to be had for the capital city of the Republic.

In what I may say, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to be understood as reflecting upon the individual members of the present school board of the city. When I refer to that board I refer to it as an official entity. But I am bound to say, Mr. Chairman, that the school board as an official entity has made during its existence a record for incapacity, for inability, for weakness, for indifference, that would be hard to be equaled in any other community of our country. On the first day of this session I introduced a bill providing for the reorganization of the school board and for reasonable compensation for the teachers in the schools and a system of annual promotions for those teachers. Up to that time no matter how many children a citizen of the city might have had in the schools, no matter how large a taxpayer he might have been, he could not attend any of the meetings of the board of education. They were all held behind lock and key. It is true that since that bill was introduced, and it appeared that there was likely to be a general shaking up, the board with great alacrity resolved to hold all its meetings in public. It wanted us to understand that it was going to be good. From that time all its meetings have been held in the open and the public has been invited to attend those meetings. So the board has confessed by its action the absolute absurdity of its previous course in shutting out the public from its meetings.

To show you that this record which the board of education has made for itself is a matter of common knowledge, let me read to you from the columns of the Washington Post of March 13 last. This is what it says:

The entire educational system of the District is in sore need of such amendment as is hardly to be looked for from those to whom the evils are largely due—the board of education. Happily, there is no question here of honesty, as honesty goes in public life. The board is not a betrayer of trust, but a discourager of hope. Its members are morally irreproachable, so far as anybody knows. They follow the light as it is given to them to see it; the trouble is they see it brokenly, and follow it into barren places and weary lands.

Not all the much-talked-of resignations of teachers are due to inadequate payment. The latest instance, in which the resigning teacher averred a "complete lack of support in matters of discipline," is not a solitary example of motive, however it may shine as indignant avowal. Lack of discipline in the public schools is too general to be ascribed to anything less than a general cause, always operative, and for that we must look higher than the loose methods of any supervisor, or "little Senate," to which any hardy director "gives laws." The board itself is in fault, and for proof one need not go behind its public acts in matters still fresh in memory. In one of these it patiently "investigated" the principal of a high school who was accused of insubordination to his pupils. The board acquitted him on every charge, gave him a high character for fidelity and efficiency, and solemnly ordered him out of his school—"transferred" him! True, the storm of criticism compelled a revocation of sentence, but a tardy accessibility to penitence under the lash is not a particularly conspicuous qualification for important public duty. In another case the accused principal of another school was found guilty on all the counts and retained—with only such diminution of authority and respect as naturally comes of a public reprimand, which would better have been withheld. With two such instances in mind, it is needless to multiply proofs of feebleness, indecision, and perversity.

By passing the Gallinger bill, which retires the present board and provides for a successor, appointed by and responsible to the President, Congress can make reform, if not probable, yet possible. The new broom would doubtless sweep clean for at least a little while, and it is permitted to us to entertain the hope that nepotic directors, boneless supervisors and principals, and an incalculable multitude of faddists and frillers would be found in the dust pan.

Let me say, in passing, that the provision in the Gallinger bill relative to the appointment of the school board is identical with the provision in my bill, which was introduced on the first day of the session.

Now listen to what the Washington Times said on February 28 last. The article is headed "Why a new board is needed."

But the Times does not hesitate—although it has reached the conclusion with great reluctance—to state its conviction on the other score. It is this: That while the school system may be, and probably is, good in the main, and the corps of teachers is both loyal and capable, the administration of the system has not been businesslike at the top, and that an important change, the creation of a new board of education, is indispensable if that administration is to be businesslike in the future. The Times does not, in this connection, consider the members of the board individually. They are good citizens. Several of them would be worthy members of any body intrusted with any such responsibilities. But as a whole it is believed they operate as disadvantageously on each other as water on milk.

The basis of this conviction is the following:

1. That the board of education on June 29, 1905, voted to depose Principal Swartzell, of the Eastern High School, and assign him "to another position of equal grade in the public schools," on the ground that he was not suited to the duties of a principal.

That the next day, after voting Mr. Swartzell unsuited to control a school of 250 pupils, it voted to place him in charge of the Central High School, with 1,000 pupils.

That the next month, on July 20, it voted to continue him at the Eastern in the face of its own previous finding that he was not suited to the duties of that post.

2. That the board adopted a report on October 30, 1905, finding that the principal of the Colored High School, Mrs. Anna J. Cooper, had introduced text-books without authority; that she had more than once circumvented the orders of her superiors (including the board of education) specifically by continuing in the high school pupils ordered to be sent back to the graded schools; that what the principal herself called "sympathetic methods" had "resulted in too many and too frequent reexaminations of weak students in order to enable them to pass from one grade to another and to graduate, while in a few instances conditions have not been passed off as required;" that "she has not maintained that proper official relation, that strict loyalty to the director of high schools that should prevail in a well-organized system;" that the superintendent and director had erred in yielding ever so slightly to her "demands," and that, in the face of all these findings, but "in view of the very strong desire of the colored race in this District," the principal was maintained in her position, with an admonition that hereafter "in her official conduct she shall recognize the authority of her superior officer, the director of high schools, and conform her official conduct in all respects to the rules of the board."

3. That in spite of its censure of the superintendent and director of high schools and its own extraordinary direction that this principal must be subordinate it has since permitted her to deal directly with its individual members, among other things, as to the allotment of additional teachers to her school.

4. That in matters of such importance as the transfer of high school principals, as in the case of Mr. Swartzell, the appointment of teachers, as in the cases of H. M. Josephs, W. L. Smith, and M. P. Burrill, and the promotion of teachers, as in the case of C. M. Shippen, it has more than once neglected altogether to consult either the superintendent of schools or the supervisor in charge.

5. That it has appointed at least one teacher to the high schools—it is not needful to give her name in this place—avowedly as an act of charity and with no reasonable inquiry into the applicant's capability.

6. That the president of the board has more than once—it is said in his behalf that he has done so out of "kindly interest in the applicants"—undertaken to waive the formality of the regular inquiry into the fitness of pupils who have applied for admission to the high schools from other than the Washington public schools, and that he has done this even in the case of a boy dismissed from his old school as beyond the control of the teachers.

7. That the board, in spite of the explicit showing of the high school rolls that accumulated "deficiencies" have prevailed against the pupils concerned and still stand against those pupils, has compelled the director of high schools, against his strong remonstrance, to sign diplomas certifying that those pupils have "satisfactorily" completed the course of studies prescribed in the Washington schools.

8. That the effect of this administration is already manifest in the fact that of ten former students at the high school most affected—the Colored High School—who are now studying at normal schools or colleges and were asked to give the standing of the markings of the Washington high schools at those other schools, one did not answer, one was noncommittal, and eight were of the opinion that the passing mark of 75 points in 100, on which the diploma is based, is accepted elsewhere as worth about 50 points.

This is not the whole story, but it is enough. Surely, if these counts against the board are founded in fact—and they can all be verified by examining the board's own reports of its own proceedings, or examining its members separately, the superintendent, and the director of high schools—there is no escaping the conclusion that the board must be changed. There is no reason to believe that what has already happened in the M Street High School and to the diplomas issued from that school may not happen to the other high schools and the diplomas issued there and may not, and that soon, involve as disastrously the administration of all the graded schools. It is manifest the school organization is neither coherent nor harmonious. And the one defense that has been made in answer to these criticisms—that they are nothing more than mistakes—merely accentuates the danger.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for ten minutes.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I would like to continue until I finish. I will finish as soon as I can.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont asks that he man continue until he has concluded his speech. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Vermont yield?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Is it the purpose of the gentleman's amendment to legislate this board out of office?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I recognize the fact that it is an unpleasant thing, an ungracious thing, to undertake to legislate a person out of office; and while my amendment does legislate the present board out of existence, I would not object if the appointing power which I name in my amendment should see fit to reappoint the members of this board.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. But evidently the object of the gentleman is to have a change in the board.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] is absolutely right. My single object is to have a change in the board, to have a change for the better in the board, to improve the board, to make it a board with sufficient capacity and practical business ability to conduct the schools of Washington in a proper manner. To this end I propose a change in the appointing power of the board so that the school system may be entirely divorced from the rest of the municipal government, just as the schools are divorced from the rest of the municipal government in almost every other community in this fair land of ours. At present, as the members of this committee well know, the school board is appointed by the District Commissioners.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Now, if I heard the amendment correctly, I am unable to say to whom the gentleman referred as the appointing power, the supreme court of the District or the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. My amendment makes the judges of the supreme court of the District the appointing power. I admit that this is not the ideal method. In my original bill I provided for the appointment of the members of the board by the President of the United States, who now appoints the District Commissioners. But the Committee on the District of Columbia, who had the bills in charge, spurned that proposition.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Why not leave it with the Commissioners of the District?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Simply because if you do that you will continue to have the same kind of a school board that we have had all these years.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Surely the District Commissioners have as much interest in the welfare of the District and the schools of the District as any other officials.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Well, I am not denying that they are patriotic and well-meaning individuals, but I do say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH], that we gave these District Commissioners the power to appoint the members of the school board. We have had many years of experience. And I repeat that that experience has resulted in a board whose record is one of weakness, of incapacity, of inability, of indifference. It is my humble opinion that this condition of things is due to the fact that the members of the board of education are appointed by, and are under the supervision of, this little body of "peanut politicians" to whom my friend [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] refers as District Commissioners. [Laughter and applause.] Is it possible that Macfarland, the chairman of the District Commissioners, is the only Moses of this great capital city? Have we here in this city of 300,000 people no civic virtue except that which is bound by the limits of this District Commission?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman addresses an inquiry to me. I desire to go on record as saying that I do not believe a finer type of man exists in this District than Mr. Macfarland and his associates now upon the District Commission.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Oh, well; I shall not quarrel with my good friend from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH]. He has a perfect right to his opinion.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. And I expressed it.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I am always glad to hear my good friend from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] express his opinion. But he sometimes forgets that his thinking it so does not make it so. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. It does in my judgment.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. But my friend [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] does not constitute a majority. To show you that I am not exaggerating the situation when I declare that the record of the board of education is one of weakness and incapacity and indifference, let me call your attention to a matter which is now pending. You have all seen accounts of it in the daily papers. Several days ago ten or eleven teachers in the McKinley Training School filed their charges against the principal of that school. These charges are in part as follows:

We, the undersigned teachers of the McKinley Manual Training School, believing that conditions in that school have become so demoralized that they are harmful to the school system of the District of Columbia and to the healthful development of the mind and character of the pupils, and believing that the chief responsibility for this condition of affairs rests upon the principal, A. I. Gardner, do hereby respectfully request your honorable body to institute and conduct such an investigation of his administration as principal as may seem proper to you in order to fix the responsibility for the aforesaid state of affairs and to remedy it.

We base our request upon the following charges, all of which are either known to be true by us personally or have been told us by fellow-teachers of the same school in whom we have confidence, as being within their personal knowledge:

He has repeatedly violated rules of the board of education, to wit: The rule concerning tardiness of teachers, the rule forbidding teachers to smoke inside the school building, the rule providing for substitute teachers, the rule against excusing pupils before the close of school in order to permit them to take private lessons outside.

DISCIPLINE ALLEGED TO BE DESTROYED.

He has completely destroyed the discipline in the school by failing to support teachers in their efforts to punish violations of the school rules; by granting permanent excuses for tardiness and absence during school hours; by granting excuses for absence upon slight pretext, and by a lack of supervision over pupils while they are under the care of the school. This last has resulted in the visiting of pool rooms on Seventh street by the boys of the school, in the smoking of cigarettes by boys near the school building, in the playing of baseball in the school yard during school hours, in the remaining of boys and girls in the school building until after 4 o'clock in the afternoon without supervision by any teacher, and in the giving of inadequately chaperoned dances in the school building at night.

He has caused the standard of scholarship to be greatly lowered by the admission of unprepared pupils, either without examination or by allowing them to enter after failure to pass the entrance examinations; by promoting pupils who, according to the rules of promotion which he himself had made, were not entitled to promotion; by giving an indefinite number of examinations to pupils in order to enable them to pass off conditions, and by allowing captains to drill their companies, although they had deficiencies against them and had been relieved of their duties by the military committee of the faculty pending the removal of their conditions.

He has permitted the moral tone of the school to degenerate by his unwillingness to investigate cheating and stealing; by his unwillingness to punish adequately the culprits when caught, and by hindering others who have tried to investigate on their own initiative.

Now, what would be done in almost any other community in the country? What would be done in any of the communities represented by my friend from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH]? Why, the school board would meet at once, there would be a summary hearing in public, that the sunlight of truth might reach every detail. There would be a prompt finding of facts. Summary action would follow. Either the principal would be removed as a person unfit for the principalship of so important a school, as an improper person to be over the young of the community, or the teachers who filed the charges would be summarily dismissed for insubordination. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] deny this? No. But let us see what was done here.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Vermont yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman from Vermont should cross-examine himself, and ask and answer his own questions, but I object to his cross-examining me and then answering the questions for me.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Well, if my good friend from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] will keep still, I will not do it any more. But let me ask again what was done here? Did the school board take prompt action? Oh, no; not at all. The members of the board had not the courage to take hold of the matter and do their duty fearlessly and effectively. They were afraid that if they should take action, and should find the facts against the principal, his friends might rush to Congress and ask that the power to appoint the school board be transferred from the District Commissioners to some other body. They were afraid that if they took action and decided against the eleven teachers that they and their friends would make a similar appeal to Congress. And so they just did nothing; but the superintendent of schools started out with a dark lantern to interview the teachers and to interview the principal and to interview the pupils. Instead of opening up the matter so that the sunlight of truth might illumine the case, he is worming about to find some way of saying that the eleven teachers are all right in their position, and that the principal is all right in his position, and that the pupils are all right in their position, and that the peace and tranquillity of the community, and particularly of the school board, require that nothing be done. He is seeking to gain time in order to get his whitewash brush ready for use.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Well, now, the gentleman from Vermont has given us a case.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I have not got through with the case.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Is that the best case you have got?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. If my good friend from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] can see anything in the case to justify him in calling it "the best case," he is welcome to do so.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman from Vermont relies on the newspaper statements; and on that do you base your conclusions?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] deny the facts to be as I have stated them about this pending investigation?

Mr. KEIFER. I discover that the gentleman is following the statement published and sent around to us here by some irresponsible parties, or in the newspapers, and knows nothing about the matter himself.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I do not know who has been following up the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER]. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman is evidently making his speech on that, and does not know anything about the facts himself.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I have stated the facts, and I challenge the gentleman to prove that they are not true.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand the gentleman does not pretend to know anything except what he gets out of the excerpts which he has read.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. The articles I read from the papers appeared long before this matter came up. Before reading those articles I distinctly told the committee that I read them simply to show that the existing condition of things in the school board was a matter of common knowledge. This McKinley School affair has all occurred within the last few days, and I have quoted nothing from any paper respecting it. I have stated, and I again repeat, that our school board, whose duty it was to investigate promptly the charges filed against the principal, with the incapacity and indifference which has characterized its conduct heretofore, neglected to take any action whatever, but left it to the superintendent to go groping about with his dark lantern, as if to keep the real facts from the public.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman refer to the condition of affairs at the high school that has compelled most of the scholars to leave there?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I have no personal knowledge as to how many of the scholars have left.

Mr. KEIFER. You do not know of your own knowledge the facts as to what you are stating?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. The teachers made their charges in writing. Those charges are now on file. If the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] thinks he can befog the members of this committee by claiming that I have not personal knowledge of that fact, he is entirely at liberty to delight himself with the delusion. But if he has any better light to give, I shall be very glad to let him have the opportunity.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I am not quite through.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. You have plenty of time.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Oh, well, yes.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. You say the gentleman from Ohio has no light. The only light you had is the lantern you put in the hands of the superintendent as he went around to do his interviewing.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. My friend from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] should not be too hasty. My torch may yet flame up and illumine the subject so that even he may see the truth.

On the 15th of April the Evening Star had what purported to be an interview with Mrs. West, one of the members of the school board. Let me say for the benefit of my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] and my distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] that I have no personal knowledge as to whether the interview which I am about to read ever took place. I have no personal knowledge as to whether Mrs. West ever said what she is purported in this article to have said. But I want to read to this committee the article. It is headed "Mrs. West's Views."

Mrs. H. L. West, Mrs. B. G. Francis, and Dr. Richard Kingsman form the industrial committee of the board. The former was seen this morning, and in the course of conversation said:

"Although Mrs. Francis is chairman of the committee, matters pertaining to McKinley School have been, by courtesy, in the main given to me. It is absurd to call the petition a bolt from the sky. My surprise has been that it has been so long delayed. I have been expecting it for more than a year, and I know from what Doctor Kingsman and Mr. Stuart have said that they have long been concerned about the school."

As I said, this interview appeared in the Star on the 15th of April, and there has been no denial in the public prints. If Mrs. West is correctly reported, we had the spectacle of a member of this school board publicly declaring that she has expected for more than a year an uprising on the part of the teachers in the McKinley School because of existing conditions. And then we have the spectacle of the same member of the same board of education, when the uprising finally comes, sitting supinely at home and contenting herself, so far as her official duties are concerned, with declaring that it was absurd for the other members of the board to call the petition of the McKinley School teachers "a bolt from the sky."

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Yes; certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will you state whether Mrs. H. L. West is related to Commissioner West, of the District?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Well, now, to be absolutely accurate, and so not to offend the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], I must admit that I have no personal knowledge as to the relationship which exists between Mrs. H. L. West and Mr. H. L. West, one of the District Commissioners, but I may be permitted to add that she is commonly reputed to be his wife. [Laughter.]

It has already been shown on this floor that this school board went through a similar experience last year. I will not repeat the details of that incident. The board removed the principal of one of the schools for incompetency. Then it made him principal of a larger school. Then there was so great an outburst of indignation that the board removed him from this second position and finally restored him to his original place. Meantime the community was kept in an uproar for months. These are only illustrations of the record which the board has made for itself—a record of weakness, of inefficiency. And now, Mr. Chairman, when we are asked to consider the proposition of pouring out more money for the maintenance of these schools, for the improvement of the schools, for the just compensation of the teachers in the schools, we ought to consider whether we can not devise a method by which a better board of education may be obtained.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does the gentleman believe that the supreme court of the District of Columbia would take sufficient interest in the administration of school affairs to see that the school board always did its duty? It seems to me that we had about as well put all the names of the inhabitants of the District in a hat and draw out nine of them.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. The members of the supreme court of the District of Columbia are distinguished American citizens. They are men of broad culture, of great learning, of unquestioned patriotism. I know some of them personally, and a say to my friend from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] unhesitatingly that I believe they would discharge their duty in this behalf in a manner eminently satisfactory to all concerned.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. They are busy men.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Yes; they are busy men; but they are residents of the city. They come in close contact with the business and professional men of the community, with the very best people in the community. And let me say further to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] that the method has been tried in the great city of Philadelphia and has proved remarkably successful. The distinguished gentleman who has charge of this bill [Mr. MORRELL] can tell the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] how well this method has succeeded in his city. There the members of the school board are appointed by the board of local judges, and I believe that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] who is in charge of the bill would personally favor the proposition of having the school board here appointed by the supreme court judges of the District. The Philadelphia school system is one of the very best systems in this country, and there is no reason to suppose that the supreme court judges of this city would not do as well in the selection of the members of the school board as have the local judges in the city of Philadelphia. There is no reason to suppose that they would not endeavor to find, and would not succeed in finding, the best persons for these positions. All that I am seeking to secure is the very best possible board to administer the school affairs of the city.

Mr. RODENBERG. Do the members of the present school board receive any pay for attending the meetings?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. RODENBERG. What is their pay?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Ten dollars for each meeting.

Mr. RODENBERG. Is there any limit upon the number of meetings they may hold?

Mr. MORRELL. They are limited to $500 each.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. That is correct.

Mr. RODENBERG. Then they may hold fifty meetings.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Yes; and they do hold fifty meetings every year.

Mr. MORRELL. The bill under consideration provides that they shall serve without compensation.

Mr. MADDEN. And there is no compensation provided in the appropriation bill that has just passed.

Mr. KEIFER. This bill prohibits them from drawing any.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. This bill which is now under consideration, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] have indicated, provides that the school board shall serve without pay. This was one of the provisions in my bill which was introduced on the first day of the session. Everywhere else in the United States service upon the school board is considered a patriotic privilege, and no compensation, as a rule, is given. This bill which we are now considering has many good features. It is a great improvement upon existing conditions. But we should not be satisfied with a bill that simply improves existing conditions. We ought to perfect the bill and see to it that it is the very best possible bill to be had.

It would be no great task for the members of the supreme court to select the members of this board—only three each year. Why, it would not add enough to the duties of the members of this District court to make it worth considering for a moment as an objection to the method of appointment.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. Why have you substituted in your amendment the supreme court judges of the District of Columbia for the President of the United States, as was originally provided for in your bill?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. It is true that my bill provided for the appointment of the members of the board of education by the President of the United States. The Committee on the District of Columbia spurned that proposition. I have been trying to find some proposition that that committee would accept. Upon reflection, it seemed to me that on many grounds the appointment by the supreme court judges of the District is preferable to that by the President of the United States.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman from Vermont yield to me?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. With pleasure.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have a good deal of sympathy with the gentleman from Vermont in his effort to remove these appointments from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia; but does not the gentleman think that the putting of a sort of political appointing power upon the court is a bad precedent to set? Would not the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Education be better?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I have given this matter a great deal of consideration, and I can say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] that, in my humble opinion, the judges of the supreme court constitute the best appointing power to be found in the District of Columbia. I refer the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL], who lives in Philadelphia, who is familiar with the conditions there, and who can detail to him how successfully the school system has worked there. I am confident that he could convince the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] that this method of appointment has detracted nothing from the dignity and prestige of the local judges of Philadelphia, and that it has resulted in a board of education of high standing for integrity and efficiency. It has certainly resulted in securing for the city of Philadelphia one of the best school systems to be found anywhere.

Mr. GREENE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Vermont a question.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I will gladly yield to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE. In how many other States or Territories, aside from Pennsylvania, is the appointing power lodged in the judges of the court?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Not in many. In nearly every community the very best method for the selection of the members of the school board prevails—the method of election by the sovereign people. Where that method prevails the board is responsible directly to the taxpayers, and broad, patriotic citizens are chosen to serve upon the board, and they are glad to give their services as a matter of patriotism for the benefit of the boys and the girls of their respective communities. And this is the method that I am finally in favor of here. I think that we must in the end return to that system in the District of Columbia. I shall be glad to follow the leadership of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] and give the city of Washington the very best possible city charter constructed along modern lines. Then upon the citizens of the city would rest the responsibility for their schools as well as for their other municipal affairs. But for the present it seems to me we are taking a step in the right direction. We are endeavoring to extend the circle of civic responsibility. We are endeavoring to demonstrate that not all the civic virtue of the city of Washington is centered in the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, in whom my friend from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] has such unbounded faith, and for whom he has such unbounded admiration.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Certainly I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LACEY. Conceding that you would improve the school board by having them appointed by the judges of the supreme court, has my friend considered the effect it would have upon the court itself to give it political power? I would like to call the gentleman's attention to a case directly in point. In the district of Alaska political appointments are made by the court.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Oh, this is not a parallel case. We are not legislating for Alaska. We are legislating for the city of Washington, a city of 300,000 people, a city which boasts at least of some little advance in political science as well as in civilization in general.

Mr. LACEY. Every mistake made by a judge in Alaska reflected upon the court. The court was weakened because of the assaults upon its political power.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Well, I dislike to repeat, but I will refer the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] to a much nearer instance. I refer him to the city of Philadelphia, where the plan of having the members of the school board appointed by the local board of judges has worked admirably. I will leave it to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL], who lives in Philadelphia, to demonstrate to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] how admirably the plan has worked there. And I will leave it to the other Members of this House whose homes are in Philadelphia [Mr. MOON and Mr. MCCREARY] whether there has ever been a word of criticism upon the courts of Philadelphia; whether their prestige has been in the least unfavorably affected because of the fact that the judges appoint the members of the school board of the city.

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. With pleasure.

Mr. COCKRAN. I have a very high respect for everything which the gentleman from Vermont may say or offer for the consideration of the committee. He has said that at first he thought the best method of appointment would be to have it exercised by the President of the United States, but that the committee rejected his suggestion to that effect. Now he appears to have offered a suggestion that the appointments be made by the supreme court of the District of Columbia. Why has he not embodied in this amendment now pending his original idea that the school commissioners be appointed by the President of the United States?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I have already explained that, Mr. Chairman. When I first introduced my bill, on the first day of the session, I provided that these school commissioners should be appointed by the President. I recognized that that was not an ideal method, for while the President of the United States comes into close contact with the Members of the House and the Senate and with the whole official circle here in Washington, he necessarily does not come into that close acquaintanceship with the business and professional men of the community which should be enjoyed by the appointing power in a case of this kind. Upon reflection I was forced to the conclusion that the Philadelphia method was better adapted to this city than the method which I had first suggested. I would, however, have clung to my first proposition had not, as I said before, that proposition been spurned by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HUGHES. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Vermont has made certain statements here, especially in connection with Mrs. West. I want to know from him if he knows that Mrs. West was a member of this school board prior to her marriage to Mr. West?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I do not know anything about it. But let me say to my friend from West Virginia [Mr. HUGHES] that in all this discussion, and in all the discussion of the matter outside the House of Representatives, it has been my earnest desire to say nothing against the personnel of the present board. I referred to Mrs. West simply because of the interview in which she was reported to have made an astounding statement, which I read to the committee. I am complaining of the school board as an official entity, and I am urging upon the committee the importance of making it possible for the city of Washington to have a better board.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I just want to state for the information of the House that Mrs. West, prior to her marriage to Mr. West, was a member of this school board, and her appointment was only a reappointment.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Vermont if he would be willing to accept a change in his proposed amendment so that the President would have the appointing power.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I would be entirely willing to accept such an amendment. If this committee should prefer to make the President the appointing power, I would gladly acquiesce.

Mr. SULZER. I hope the gentleman will accept the amendment, and I believe if he will that it will be carried.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. My single purpose in this amendment is to provide for an absolute divorce of the school system from the rest of the municipal government. I believe that this is absolutely essential in order to secure the best results. I have no pride of opinion as to the selection of the appointing power. Only take the appointing power from the District Commissioners, and an improvement over present conditions will be assured.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not believe that if the appointing power were given to the judges of the supreme court they might logroll so that each member of the court would appoint his own member of the school board, and in that way get a school board which might not be as good as could be had were the appointing power in some individual upon whom all the responsibility might rest?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Well, as I have before indicated, I have no fears of bad results in case my amendment is adopted. I have profound faith in the integrity, the patriotism, and the honor of the distinguished gentlemen who comprise the supreme court of the District of Columbia.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Vermont has used the term "spurned," and as he and I were partners, each having introduced a similar bill, making the President the appointing power, I would like to say that the word "spurned" is perhaps a little severe. If the gentleman will pardon me, I would suggest that I would use the word "rejected" instead of "spurned," because I think he will agree with me that the committee was very courteous in its treatment of the various members who introduced bills. They did not agree with us always. We did not expect them to. But I could hardly use the term "spurned" myself, and I know that my colleague from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER] always desires to be courteous, and perhaps upon reflection he would withdraw the word and use "rejected."

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I make no complaint against the individual members of the Committee on the District of Columbia. It is the committee as an aggregate of which I complain [laughter]; it was the committee as an official entity that "spurned" my proposition. The individual members of the committee treated me courteously; they are my personal friends. The chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. MORRELL], who has the bill in charge, took up with me personally the various provisions of my bill. He has given the subject a great deal of attention. He has exhibited much industry in preparing the bill which is now under consideration. I believe that personally he does not look with disfavor upon my amendment. And I wish to do full justice by the committee. This bill which it reported is a good bill. It is a long step in the right direction. But there is nothing in all this to deter us from improving and perfecting the bill.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Vermont has made his meaning so entirely clear in answer to my last inquiry that I should like to put another for the purpose of gaining additional light on this question. As I understand it, the gentleman from Vermont is in favor of changing the method of appointment, because the present Commission, in his judgment, is wholly incapable of exercising this power of appointment.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I have not said it was wholly incapable of exercising this power.

Mr. COCKRAN. Then that it is unreasonable to expect that they would.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I claim that it would be much better to divorce the school system of the District from the rest of the municipal government. I insist that what is good for every other community in the land is good for Washington.

Mr. COCKRAN. Now, that belief is based, as I understand it, upon some newspaper articles which the gentleman has read here to the committee.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I don't know what reason the gentleman has to assume that. I have not said so at all. I have stated more than once that my purpose in reading those articles was to show that the record of the present school board for weakness, for inefficiency, for indifference, was a matter of common knowledge.

Mr. COCKRAN. I want to know whether the gentleman has himself verified by personal examination the facts which he has spread before the committee, or whether he simply brings to our attention reports that have been in general circulation. The gentleman must see that while anything he might say here upon his own authority would, in my judgment, be accepted unquestionably by every Member in the House, yet if he merely repeats current rumors then those rumors are entitled to no greater weight than their sources of themselves may justify.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I sincerely thank the gentleman from New York for the compliment he pays me by indicating the confidence he would have in my judgment when based upon personal investigation. And of course the gentleman is entirely right as to the proper consideration that should be given my words if they were based upon mere rumor. But, Mr. Chairman, I am not quoting rumors; I am stating facts.

Mr. COCKRAN. Are these facts of the gentleman's own knowledge?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Certainly they are. I have carefully indicated in my remarks whenever I had no personal knowledge of the matter discussed. I clearly stated, for instance, that I had no personal knowledge whether in point of fact Mrs. West ever made the statements imputed to her in the article I read from the Evening Star. But I did say that there had been no denial in the public press of the statements which she was alleged to have made.

Mr. COCKRAN. Now, do I understand the gentleman holds these men to be unworthy of any further confidence because certain members of the board did not think proper to deny certain statements in the newspapers? It is very important we should know just what facts we are proceeding on.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Well, if the gentleman after listening to me this length of time has not understood what I am talking about, has not understood my reasons for asking for a change in the appointing power of this school board, then I fear that I can not make myself plain to him.

Mr. COCKRAN. Well, I think the gentleman does himself very faint justice. I think the gentleman has made perfectly clear exactly what he is proceeding on. It was through fear that I might have misapprehended the gentleman that I asked specifically whether he based his conclusion upon newspaper statements or upon personal examination of the facts with which the newspapers claim to deal.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I will repeat that I vouch for what I have said, with the exception of the statement which Mrs. West is purported to have made. I insist that this board has made a record for itself, that that record is a matter of common knowledge, that it is a record of incompetency, of weakness, of incapacity, of indifference, and I have stated facts to corroborate my statements.

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask one more question?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRAN. I merely desire to ask were his statements here in reference to incapacity and incompetence on the part of these commissioners all based on newspaper articles?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I repeat, emphatically, no; none of them except this statement with reference to Mrs. West.

Mr. COCKRAN. And the gentleman has personally examined the schools?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Yes. I have had children in the schools. I have a personal acquaintance with a large number of the teachers and officers of the schools.

Mr. COCKRAN. And it is, then, upon that examination I understand the gentleman bases his statements.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Upon this and upon a great deal more personal investigation. Why, Mr. Chairman, I am entirely disinterested in this matter. I have no ax to grind. I find no pleasure in standing here arraigning the school board of Washington. But I am interested in the system of public schools, for which we are absolutely responsible. I am interested in the boys and girls of this great city. I believe that it is our duty to see to it that they are afforded the very best system of public instruction. They are in our care. We are responsible for their education. I found upon investigation that up to and including the fourth grade no child in the District is given but half a day's schooling. Hundreds of these children are provided with only half a day's schooling. One teacher and her flock of pupils will file into a room and occupy it during the forenoon. Then she and her charge will file out, and another teacher and her flock will file in for the afternoon. I called the attention of the Committee on the District of Columbia to this fact. That committee investigated it. That committee found the facts to be as I now describe them. And there is incorporated in the pending bill a provision to correct this condition.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. May I ask the gentleman a question? Who employs the superintendent or teacher who has so deported himself that a great many of the pupils, as the gentleman from Chicago [Mr. MADDEN] states, have left the school? Who employs him—this board?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. The school board employs the superintendent of schools. And so, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, let us give the Committee on the District of Columbia due credit for its painstaking labor in preparing the pending bill. But let us remember that it is the House of Representatives that is legislating, and that each Member of the House has a personal duty to perform in connection with this bill. We all have a personal interest in the capital city of the nation. Our constituents all have a personal interest in her welfare, her progress, and her development. The people of the United States desire to see Washington the finest city in all respects in our land. It is rapidly becoming a great educational center, and we should seek to give it the best public school system to be found anywhere. I appeal to you, therefore, to adopt this amendment, and thereby to lift the school system out of the slough in which we now find it. Let us widen the circle of civic responsibility. Let us widen the circle of civic virtue. Let us place the power to appoint the members of the school board in the hands of a body of men who will have an eye single to the welfare of the schools, who will consider it their patriotic duty to see to it that the best persons are found for that board—persons of the largest business ability, of wide educational experience, of the highest integrity, of unquestioned courage, of steadfast devotion, to administer this great system of public instruction. [Applause.].

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER], I may say that the committee went very carefully into the subject of who should be the appointing power of the board of education. If the power of appointment was taken out of the hands of the Commissioners of the District and placed in the hands of, first, as was suggested, the President of the United States, it would be lifting simply that power one up, the President of the United States appointing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, they in turn appointing the board of education. The Commissioners themselves and the people who appeared before the committee were unanimous in the desire that the appointing power should remain in the Commissioners, for the reason, the people argued, that the Commissioners were their representatives and that the Commissioners came closer to the people of the District than the President of the United States. They had a better chance of becoming more intimately connected with the people residing in the District and of judging as to whom would give the best service on the board. Moreover, the many and various duties of the President seemed to preclude his being able to give the time requisite to a careful decision. And it was for that reason that the committee did not consider the President as the appointing power. As far as the appointing power to be placed in the hands of the justices of the supreme court of the District is concerned, that might, from the experience I have had, be advisable, and I may say that I personally made that suggestion before the committee. However, it did not appeal to the members of the committee, and it was so finally decided and voted that the appointing power should remain where it is, in the hands of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. Therefore, I sincerely trust that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont will not maintain.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MORRELL. As far as the provision of the bill providing for certain members of the board being of the colored race is concerned, I may say that the board of education as it is now constituted—with seven members of the board—two of them are of the colored race.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MORRELL. In one second I will. And that every colored educator and every colored person, and even the superintendent of the schools, argued that it should be specifically stated in the bill just what positions the colored people were to occupy and what their duties should be. I may state that it was for that reason that those who framed the bill were so specific in making use of the words "colored people."

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]?

Mr. MORRELL. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DALZELL. Is not the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER] divisible? The first part, as I understand, relates to the personnel of the board, and the second part relates to the appointing power. It seems to me it is divisible, and the committee ought to have an opportunity to vote on each branch of the proposition.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. There will be no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is divisible, because it contains two separate propositions.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] tell the House whether the present board of education was appointed by the District Commissioners?

Mr. MORRELL. I am not sure of that, because I do not know whether any vacancies existed when the present board came into power. Some of these may have held over under the old law. It must be remembered that the members of the present board have terms of service of seven years—a length of term I do not approve of.

Mr. MADDEN. My reason for asking the question is, Mr. Chairman, that during the hearings before the District Appropriations Committee it was developed that the school to which the gentleman referred in his remarks was presided over by a principal whose conduct was such as to make it impossible for the children of the neighborhood to attend that school. The way this information was developed was from inquiry by members of the Appropriations Committee, in which they sought to ascertain how many children there were in the District of school age for whom facilities were not afforded. And it was shown that while there was room for some seven or eight hundred children in this particular school, there was not in attendance and had not been for a long time more than 400. I may not have the figures correct, but it would be in that proportion. It was also developed in that investigation that this principal was tried for misconduct.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment.

It was developed in the trial of this man that he so conducted the affairs of the school that the children could not or would not attend it while under his supervision. He was reinstated on the promise, as I understand, that he would behave himself better in the future.

Mr. FREDERICK LANDIS. Did he do better?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know what he did, but he drove all the children out of the school. That is one thing he did. Since reinstatement I understand that he has been conducting himself as he did before, and that now there is a protest against his occupying the position filed by a large number of the teachers of that school. The Board of the Commissioners of the District, if they had the appointing power, should have had some influence with the board of education—sufficient influence, I believed then and believe now, to compel the discharge of such a principal. If the children of the District were obliged to walk the streets because there was no room in the schools, some action should have been taken which would have at least afforded an opportunity for attendance in a building where there was plenty of room.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has this board declined to try him the second time?

Mr. MADDEN. I understand so.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How long has the petition been filed?

Mr. MADDEN. Within the last week; perhaps longer than that. Now, Mr. Chairman, my point is that if such a bad condition exists in the board of education, appointed by the District Commissioners, some other appointing power should be created, and my judgment is that the best place to put that appointing power is in the President of the United States. To say that he is not in as close touch with the people as the District Commissioners is an absurdity, for if there is anybody in this country in close touch with the American people it is the present occupant of the White House. [Loud applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri and Mr. PAYNE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

The Chair desires to state, in further answer to the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that while as an original proposition the standing alone of the proposition would be clearly divisible, the Chair finds, on examination of Rule XVI, paragraph 7, that "a motion to strike out and insert is indivisible." The Chair would therefore hold that this amendment is not divisible. It is obvious, of course, the same purpose can be reached by an amendment to the amendment by striking out either one of the separate provisions. The Chair thought it necessary to make this statement.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the situation in this House to-day demonstrates what I have frequently asserted to be the fact—that the Congress of the United States is utterly incompetent to conduct the local affairs of the District of Columbia.

We have pending here now four distinct propositions as to how these school trustees shall be elected or appointed. The committee recommends that the Commissioners of the District appoint them. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER] recommends that the supreme court of the District of Columbia appoint them. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] wants the President of the United States to appoint them. Somebody suggested, although the proposition has not been put into concrete form, that the people of the District elect the trustees; and, gentlemen, when you get down to the bottom facts about it, that is the only one of these propositions that has any common sense in it. [Applause.]

I see the gentleman from Ohio, General KEIFER, applauded that statement. I will give him a piece of advice and some information very suddenly. The gentleman has a bill pending here now to do what I have introduced a bill in three Congresses to accomplish—to give these people local self-government. But you will be a great deal older than you are before you get that bill passed. [Laughter and applause.] I learned much by experience; my friend from Ohio will do likewise. I entered upon that crusade full of hope; but the longer I kept at it the more hope diminished, because the people who rule public sentiment in this city do not propose that that thing shall happen—not if they can prevent it.

It is commonly asserted that this is the best ruled city on the continent. I deny it. It is the worst ruled city on the continent. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I do not criticise the Commissioners. They do the best they can, no doubt. I inveigh against an evil system, for any system is bad that deprives people of their rights or relieves them from their responsibilities as citizens. The state of affairs that exists in the District of Columbia to-day, right under the shadow of the Dome of the Capitol, is the severest condemnation of our entire system of representative government that human ingenuity could devise. If I had my way about it, I would put the people of the District on a flat-footed equality, so far as home rule is concerned, with the rest of the communities of the United States, and they should work out their own salvation with fear and trembling. [Laughter and applause.] Give them back the right to vote; compel them to levy and to collect their own taxes and to disburse their own revenues. Then their ideas of economy will be much improved. Let them cease to be wards of the nation. Let them wrestle with the problems which influence their prosperity and happiness. It is not always a pleasant function to participate in public affairs, but it is a health-giving performance nevertheless. If the Congress could be induced to attend to its own business and the people of the District could be induced to attend to theirs, we would all be better off.

I congratulate the committee on bringing in this bill. It is not perfect—some of us want to perfect it—but it is a step in the right direction. In the last Congress the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] and the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER] led a crusade to reorganize these schools, and I was their humble coadjutor in that work. We extracted then from the Committee on the District of Columbia, or the Committee on Appropriations—whichever committee it was that had the bill in charge—a promise that at this session of Congress a proposition should be brought in to increase the teachers' salaries.

That is what ought to have been brought in here, without any of these complications about reorganizing the service. It is written that "the laborer is worthy of his hire," and there is no class of laborers in the wide, wide world better entitled to a good wage, a fair wage, a living wage, than the schoolteachers of the country. [Applause.] So far as that purpose has been accomplished in this bill, I am heartily in favor of it. I do not advocate extravagant or excessive pay for the teachers, but good pay. The most unprofitable performance known among men is to employ incompetent teachers, and competent teachers can be retained only by giving them adequate compensation.

So far as giving the President the right to appoint these trustees is concerned, I am opposed to it. I think that he already has duties enough to discharge. They are multitudinous and multifarious. By the time he runs Congress [laughter] and makes 300,000 appointments, and lectures "The man with the muck rake," and educates husbands and wives as to their domestic relation, and roasts Federal judges for miscarriages of justice—God knows they need roasting—and establishes peace betwixt warring nations, and polices the Western Hemisphere, and attends to those other things of which he seems to take supervisory interest, I think he will have enough of the white man's burdens on his shoulders without assuming any more of them. [Applause and laughter.] I know that he is a remarkable man, in the very flower of his years; I recognize that he is a man of vast energy, a sort of human dynamo; but you need not expect to have that sort of a man in the White House forever and eternally. Suppose you put a man in there next time with only ordinary energy and ordinary powers of endurance, and then load him down with this new burden. It will be decidedly unhealthy for him. We are legislating for the average President and not on the theory that we will have President Roosevelt with us till the end of the world.

As far as the District Commissioners are concerned, I happen to know only one of them, Henry Litchfield West, and, in my judgment, he is as fine a man as there is in the city of Washington—honest, intelligent, industrious, faithful; but the Commissioners have enough to do if they discharge their legislative and executive functions in this town—because they exercise both.

Mr. SIMS. And do not forget their social functions.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And the social duties, and the oratorical duties, too, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] suggests. To have the judges of the supreme court of the District appoint the trustees is the proposition which strikes me most favorably of these three, for I can not get the trustees elected, as they ought to be. It seems to me that the most sensible proposition actually presented here is the one suggested by the gentleman from Vermont, to have the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia appoint these trustees. They are citizens here and citizens for life. In the very nature of things they become better acquainted in the District of Columbia than the President of the United States does, although it is certainly true, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] suggests, that the present occupant of the White House is very extensively acquainted with the people of the United States—too much so, as was demonstrated by the returns of the November election in 1904. [Laughter.] But while he may have a larger and more general acquaintance, he has not as intimate acquaintance in the District as these judges have.

I do not intend to criticise this present school board. The gentleman from Vermont says he has no personal interest in the matter. I have. I have a boy and a girl going to school; and, so far as I have been able to ascertain, the teachers are efficient, the schools are most excellent, and my children have learned very rapidly; but evidently there is something out of joint about the administration of the school affairs in this District.

I do not know who is to blame in that long-drawn-out controversy which they had last summer, but I do know this, that to have a controversy about whether a certain man shall be superintendent of one of those schools drag along for four or five months in the newspapers every day is absolutely ruinous in the end to the discipline of that school, no matter who was right or who was wrong. In that case the pupils were against the teacher. In this last case that is on the boards now the teachers are against the principal. I understand it by rumor—if the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] will permit me to quote a rumor—I understand the fact to be that the boys in the McKinley School, and the girls, too, as far as I know, are enthusiastically in favor of that principal, whom eleven of the teachers have asked to have thrown out of there. The difficulty last summer could have been settled in a week, and it ought to have been settled in a week. This controversy about the McKinley School could be settled in a week, and it ought to be settled in a week; and if the present system of appointing trustees in this city does not get a board that will work out results in a reasonable lengh of time, then surely you ought to change the appointing power.

As far as the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee is concerned—that is, to substitute the word "negro" for the words "colored persons," I do not care anything about it. It is immaterial and inconsequential. It does not make a bit of difference whether a man is called a colored man or a negro. One of those appellations is just as polite as the other. In the Roman Republic they had an officer whose titular designation was censor morum—censor of manners. The other day the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] set himself up as censor verborum—censor of words—and now my friend from Tennessee is following the example of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

What I want to see done here this afternoon is to amend this bill, improve it, perfect it, and pass it in order that the teachers of this city may receive the wages to which they are properly and justly entitled. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] a few questions which are made pertinent by the range which the discussion has taken. If I understand it, the statement which has been voiced here by the gentleman from Vermont is based on facts which have been before the Committee on the District of Columbia. There is a plain intimation running all through this debate that for some reason or other the administration of these schools has practically fallen into demoralization; that the present trustees have permitted insubordination on the part of pupils, violent discussions and dissensions between teachers and principals, while, according to the gentleman from Illinois, there is in the background the shadow of some imputation suggesting the existence of grave scandal which has not been properly stated and defined on this floor. Now, I do not know any of these trustees, but if they have reached such a depth of incapacity that they can not be trusted to exercise the power of appointment provided for in this bill it seems to me they are hardly fitted to be left in office for any purpose. I think before we proceed to cast upon them an imputation so great as would be involved in the adoption of this amendment we ought to have some definite information about this charge or imputation of incapacity or worse before this committee. As the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has just said, some way or other there is demoralization. Now, if the committee has investigated that matter I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania ought to give us the benefit of the investigation.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from New York, I may say that no investigation was made by the subcommittee on the District of Columbia in relation to the alleged abuses in the schools. No charges of abuses in the schools, except in one instance, were made, and that instance was investigated by the committee to the extent of going over the testimony which had been taken by the board of education, having charge of that investigation, and we reviewed the findings from the facts presented. Those facts and the findings were such as did not warrant the subcommittee of the District of Columbia taking any action in the matter whatsoever.

The committee confined itself, as far as possible, in the deliberations to a discussion of the subject-matter of the different bills. If the gentleman had read over the hearings which were had before the subcommittee, he would see that these were the matters that were discussed, and that it was from these hearings that the bill was framed in the present shape in which it is presented to the House.

Mr. COCKRAN. The gentleman must see that in presenting a bill of this character, vesting the power of appointment in the Commissioners, it is practically certifying to the efficiency of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for the performance of this duty.

Mr. MORRELL. That might be had it not been that no testimony was submitted to the subcommittee which gave them any reason to believe otherwise.

Mr. COCKRAN. The facts stated by the gentleman from Vermont were not before the committee?

Mr. MORRELL. We had no knowledge of them.

Mr. COCKRAN. They were not before the committee in any way?

Mr. MORRELL. They were not.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I have been listening for the last hour to find out what the charge was against the present board of education. It is true the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER] says they are all fine people, good citizens individually; he likes them, commends them, gives them a certificate of character, but he makes the general charge of incapacity, and so far as I have been able to find out he bases it upon that matter over at the McKinley School, which has been in the newspapers for the past two days. I never heard of that matter until about a week ago, or of what was done last summer, but I am informed that within the past week the board has referred the whole matter to the superintendent of schools, with power to make an investigation, and that he is now engaged in that investigation.

Mr. MORRELL. I would like to interrupt the gentleman from New York and inform him that the investigation that was made last summer was in relation to another matter and not in relation to this McKinley School.

Mr. PAYNE. I was misled, then, because some gentleman on the floor connected the two together, but it seems that they are entirely different cases. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if the case that his subcommittee reviewed was the case that occurred last summer?

Mr. MORRELL. No; it was not.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I submit to the House that the indictment and proof made by the gentleman from Vermont is not sufficient to turn out this board of education with the stigma upon them, with the allegation on the part of the House that they are incompetent and incapacitated to perform the duties of their office. I do not know how long they have held these positions. I believe—and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] will correct me if I am not stating it correctly—that the present term is seven years.

Mr. MORRELL. Seven years.

Mr. PAYNE. And some of them have held office for seven years.

Mr. MORRELL. I think that is a fact.

Mr. PAYNE. The majority of them were undoubtedly appointed before the present Commissioners of the District took office and were appointed by the previous board.

Mr. MORRELL. Yes; that is a fact.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER] has no confidence in the District Commissioners and their capacity to appoint a good school board. He has confidence, which he has expressed, in the supreme court of the District, and yet both the District Commissioners and the judges of the supreme court are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate of the United States. They both get their offices in the same way and from the same source. Mr. Macfarland, whom he seems to condemn, was within the last three or four weeks reappointed a Commissioner of the District by President Roosevelt, who has had three years to see what sort of a Commissioner he has made and was so satisfied with him that he appointed him promptly, and the Senate promptly confirmed him. So I do not feel that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER] is justified in his general charge as to the capacity of the District Commissioners any more than he is justified in his indictment of the District Committee which he presented here. He says he has no charge against them individually, but he does not like their action as an entity. He characterized their voting down of his amendment as spurning the amendment. It seems to me we had better leave this matter right where it is, and in that view of it I take into consideration the fact that the judges of the supreme court of the District are entirely separate in their duties from any executive office or from the care of any executive affairs. They are appointed as judges. They are appointed because they are good lawyers and fit to be judges. They are not appointed to take in charge any executive affairs of the District. They are not appointed or selected for the purpose of selecting a board of education, which is simply of the executive department of the District and has no relation whatever to judicial functions. Therefore it is that I believe we ought to leave this thing right where it is—lodge it in the hands of the Commissioners of the District and leave it there.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I now move that all debate on this paragraph and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GUDGER] to offer an amendment.

Mr. GUDGER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to change the amendment which I sent up to read from the word "members," in line 9. Strike out all the words after the word "members," in line 9, section 2, down to the word "and," in line 11.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to close all debate upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. GUDGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a minute's time to explain this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] to the fact that the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GUDGER] is first in order, because it is a perfecting of the text, and therefore the Chair imagines the gentleman may wish to withhold his motion to close debate. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. GUDGER. Mr. Chairman, the words I propose to strike out in section 2 are as follows, in line 9: "only three of whom shall be women, and of the nine members three shall be of the colored race, one of whom shall be a woman." My purpose in striking that out is that whoever is named to appoint this board may have full power to appoint either all women or all men, or all white people or all colored people—in other words, that they must take the responsibility and use their judgment in the appointment of this board, because Congress and the people of the country will hold them responsible for the acts and the conduct of the board.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I now move that all debate on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER] and other pending amendments be now closed.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think the Chair recognized me to introduce an amendment some time ago, and suggested that I could present it later.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] perfect the text of the bill that it is proposed to have stricken out by the motion of the gentleman from Vermont?

Mr. MADDEN. No; it has nothing to do with that particular amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair thinks the gentleman had better withhold his amendment for the present.

Mr. MADDEN. Very well.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote upon the amendment which was last presented.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that all debate upon the two pending amendments and the paragraph be now closed. The question is on the motion to close debate on the paragraph and two pending amendments.

Mr. MORRELL. On the two amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee to close debate upon the two pending amendments.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina, which is first in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 2 by striking out, in line 9, page 1, all after the word "members" down to the word "and," in line 11.

The words to be stricken out read as follows: "Only three of these shall be women, and of the nine members three shall be of the colored race, one of whom shall be a woman."

Mr. MORRELL. I hope that amendment will not pass, and I call for a vote.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. GUDGER) there were—ayes 84, noes 39.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that that be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. NORRIS and Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas), the ayes were 113 and the noes were 38.

So the amendment was adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend section 2, page 2, line 18, by striking out all after the word "public" and all of line 19.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 18, strike out all after the word "public" down to and including line 19.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think it is quite as important that all of the committee meetings held under the jurisdiction of the board of education should be held in public as it is that all meetings of the board itself should be public. This amendment seeks to compel the board of education or its committees to hold all meetings of every name and nature in the open, so that any person interested in any question that may be under consideration may have the right to be present and hear what is going on.

In the great city of Chicago the mayor of the city appoints the board. There are twenty-one members of this board, and the board appoints a committee on school management, and this committee on school management hears all cases of complaint. It elects or selects and recommends to the board the appointment of all teachers, and there are no star-chamber meetings held by the board or any committee of the board for any purpose whatever, and there is no good reason why a public body transacting public business supposed to be for the public good should hold its meetings behind closed doors. Everybody in the District of Columbia is interested in every act of every committee of this board, and every citizen of the District should be permitted to be in attendance at every meeting if they choose. No committee should be permitted under any circumstances to hold a private meeting to transact public business, and if by any chance there may be teachers whose characters need investigation, as the language of this section would imply, the more publicity given to the investigation of those characters the better it would be for the public and for the teachers.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Do you object to the Senate going into executive session in the discharge of public business?

Mr. MADDEN. I have nothing whatever to do with what the Senate does——

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Do you object to the directors of a bank going into executive session to consider their business?

Mr. MADDEN. I have nothing to do with fixing the rules under which the Senate transacts its business, but to-day we, as representatives of the American people, are here to say what shall be done by a board which we are about to create.

Mr. MORRELL. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. MORRELL. I would like to ask the gentleman if he disapproves of the meetings of the different committees of the House being held behind closed doors?

Mr. MADDEN. I understand that any person wishing to enter any room in which any committee meets at any time during the session of such committees would have the right to go into the room.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. MORRELL. May I ask if that is the rule of the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly. Anybody can come in and see what we do. Even the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] can be admitted.

Mr. MORRELL. That would be a concession, I grant.

Mr. MADDEN. At all events, Mr. Chairman, there certainly ought not to be any star-chamber meetings held by this board of education.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I would say that the object of the committee, so far as that subject is concerned, was that public scandal should not be given publicity when it came to investigating the character of the teachers. It is not fair to the teachers, and for that reason the exception was made by the committee. I sincerely trust that that amendment will not prevail. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

As an old school official in the city of New York we found it necessary for committees to go into executive session upon questions of the character and standing of the teachers. The fact is, that the board of education in that city has the power to go into executive session at its pleasure. We have seldom done so, and I think but once or twice in five years, but the power should be given at least to the committees under circumstances of this character as provided in the bill. The character of the teachers may be investigated, with the many ugly rumors current, usual in cases of this kind, so that I think it would be a serious mistake and a permanent injury to the school to permit it to take place in open meetings of the committee. I trust that the amendment will not prevail, to the end that impartial justice may be done the teacher and the educational system. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to correct the text, in view of the amendment that has just been adopted. In line 10, on page 2, strike out "the Commissioners" and substitute "the supreme court judges;" so that it will read:

Vacancies for unexpired terms, caused by death, resignation, or otherwise, shall be filled by the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia.

That is just to correct the text.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MORRELL. The committee accepts the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 10, strike out the word "Commissioners" and insert "judges of the supreme court."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, before that question was put to the House I was clamoring to be heard in opposition to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs the pardon of the gentleman.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I want to say a word or two in opposition now, because the committee can retrace its steps.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to be allowed to proceed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask how much time the gentleman wants?

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Only two minutes. I just wanted to remind the committee that this bill, in my judgment, is clearly in violation of the Constitution. We had precisely a similar piece of legislation enacted by the legislature of Kentucky, conferring upon the court of appeals of Kentucky authority to appoint three commissioners like these. The court of appeals refused to exercise that function, refused to enforce that piece of legislation, and took the position that under the Constitution you could not thrust upon a judicial tribunal any legislative or executive function. The supreme court of the District of Columbia will say, "You are undertaking to load us up with certain nonjudicial duties, certain legislative and executive functions which do not harmonize with the duties of the court, and we will refuse to execute the statute."

Mr. KEIFER. Was not the decision the gentleman refers to a decision based on the provisions of the constitution of his State?

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Of course, but that provision pervades the Constitution of the United States and separates the legislative, the executive, and the judicial functions.

Mr. KEIFER. I think we have had a similar decision in Ohio to the one the gentleman cites, but it was because of the peculiar language of the constitution of the State of Ohio. I am not familiar with the case in Kentucky.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. It occurred to me that this same provision existed in substantially all the constitutions, the power to appoint the school officers creating a function that was not judicial in its character.

Mr. GARRETT. If the gentleman will permit me, a parallel case where the Supreme Court of the United States held in the early days of the Republic, when there was an act of Congress requiring of those judges that they perform certain duties, as I remember it, in pension claims——

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. Of the Revolutionary war.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. And they refused.

Mr. GARRETT. And they refused.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. The same doctrine has been announced by the Supreme Court of the United States, by the supreme court of Ohio, and by numerous other supreme courts, and I take it the statute will be null and void if it is enacted. That is all I have to say.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would have been glad to recognize the gentleman from Kentucky, but in the confusion the Chair did not hear him address the Chair.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, in lines 12 and 13, page 2, there is a provision made for the appointment of a secretary to the board. There is no term fixed here for the secretary and no salary. I would ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if it would not be better to define the salary of the office and definitely the term of the office.

Mr. MORRELL. It was certainly not the intention of the committee to ask any gentleman to work for nothing. In fixing the salaries, outside of the other employees, the salary for the secretary of the board of education is fixed at $2,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, what about the term of office?

Mr. MORRELL. At the pleasure of the board.

Mr. NORRIS. Had the committee taken that into consideration, and does the gentleman think it advisable not to fix a definite term?

Mr. MORRELL. That has always been the course—at the pleasure of the board, and removal at the pleasure of the board.

The Clerk read as follows:

The board shall also appoint a superintendent of buildings and supplies, who shall give such security for the faithful performance of the duties of his office as the board of education shall prescribe. He shall have entire jurisdiction of the care of all school buildings and premises, and shall purchase and have the care and distribution of all supplies needed for the schools, under such regulations as the board of education shall prescribe. He shall have as assistants one clerk, who shall have charge of supplies, one inspector of janitors, and one stenographer and typewriter. The assistants to the superintendent of buildings and supplies shall be appointed by the board of education upon the written recommendation of the superintendent of buildings and supplies.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 4, lines 12 down to and including line 24.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, strike out all of lines 12 to 24, both inclusive.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the object of this provision is to provide a new and unnecessary office. It has no relation whatever to the question of providing adequate salaries for the school-teachers in the schools. This provision provides for the appointment of a superintendent of repairs and supplies. In order to understand this provision, it is well to call the attention of the committee to the fact that at present all school buildings are designed, erected, and taken care of by the Engineer Commissioner in charge of the District. A man in his office is in charge of the repairs of all buildings in the District of Columbia. There are about 200 buildings in the District of Columbia under his jurisdiction. One hundred and fifty of them are schools. He receives $1,500 a year. This superintendent of repairs and supplies is to receive, under another paragraph in this bill, $3,600. The committee has included under the jurisdiction of this man the clerk who is now authorized to take charge of all supplies, and who is now receiving a salary of $1,200 a year, which this bill provides this clerk shall receive. This also transfers to the jurisdiction of the superintendent of repairs the superintendent of janitors, who is also provided for in the present law. This provision adds two employees, the superintendent, at $3,600 a year, and a stenographer for that superintendent. If he be appointed, the only time he will have anything to do is during vacation period, because, as it appeared in the preparation of the appropriation bill, outside of the vacation period there are very few men under him, and during the two months of vacation about 200 men are employed in the work of repairing schools.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to the necessity of keeping the work of repairing the schools under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Engineer Commissioner in charge of this work. The Commissioners of the District submitted from the board of education a request for $40,000 to make repairs to the Central High School. In the hearings upon the appropriation bill the subcommittee directed the engineer in charge to personally examine that building and submit a report himself. After a personal examination of the building he came before the committee and stated that for $10,000 he could do all the work that was necessary to be done to put the school in first-class shape. This provision would take out of the jurisdiction of the Engineer Commissioner the repair of schools, while it would leave under his control the work and the duty of designing the schools and the erection of the schools. It should never have been incorporated in a bill providing for a readjustment of the salaries of the school-teachers. It is a vicious provision that should be eliminated.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON. Did not the bill which we passed last Saturday, making appropriations for the District of Columbia, provide all the necessary force for doing that work?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It did.

Now, in the department of buildings, which is under the Engineer Commissioner, there is ample force to do this work, and it is merely authorizing two employees not now authorized—one to receive a salary of $3,600, and a stenographer to receive a salary, as I recollect it, of $900 a year.

Mr. MADDEN. And then it reduces the duties of the man who is already provided for.

Mr. MORRELL. In reply to the gentleman from New York, I will say, on behalf of the committee, that we went very thoroughly into the question of examinations for repairs. Colonel Biddle, the Engineer Commissioner, came before the committee and explained the system as it now exists, which is that once in every year a blank is sent to each school principal, who fills out a statement of what in his opinion is needed. This is submitted to the superintendent of repairs. In the interim the officer attached to the Engineer Commissioner's office who has charge of repairs, visits at intervals these school buildings. The statement was made that considerable reliance was placed upon the janitors of the buildings, and even upon the school principals to send notice to the Engineer Commissioner's office when repairs were needed. Now, one instance was cited where a trapdoor had been left off the roof of one of the school buildings by the janitor, resulting in a leak which had failed to be reported, with the result that a great deal of damage was done to that building. It was thought that an officer who had no other duties to perform except of going from one school to another to ascertain what repairs are needed, would perform that duty better than it is being performed now, and would in the end save his salary. Moreover, the superintendent of repairs has all the other buildings—police, fire, etc.—of the District in his charge.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MORRELL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Did the gentleman learn from the Engineer Commissioner that, in addition to the superintendent of buildings, who has charge of the investigation, construction, and repair of all buildings within the District, there are under him fifteen building inspectors, whose duty it is to examine the buildings in the District, not only as to the method of their construction, but as to their character after they are constructed, and as to whether or not they are worthy to be considered as safe at any time and whether they need repairs?

Mr. MORRELL. Not as far as the schools were concerned. The impression left upon the minds of the committee by the Engineer Commissioner was to the effect that there was but one officer to perform that duty as far as schools were concerned and as far as looking after the necessary repairs to school buildings was concerned, so much so that the Engineer Commissioner entertained an addition to his force rather than the officer herein provided.

Mr. MADDEN. The fact is that in the appropriation bill passed last Friday provision is made for the salary of the man who has always had charge of the repairs of public buildings, including the schools; and an appropriation is also made for the salaries of fifteen building inspectors, whose duty it is to see that all buildings are in proper condition, and whose further duty it is to condemn any building that ought to be condemned as unsafe; and it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that in view of the appropriations already made to cover the work of this kind that there is to be done this amendment offered by the gentleman from New York ought to prevail.

Mr. MORRELL. To go a little further in answer to the gentleman, also as far as this matter of supplies is concerned, the committee did not think that it should be a part of the duty of the superintendent of schools to have anything to do with these supplies. The superintendent of schools ought to devote all of his time to the actual instruction going on and to the charge of the teachers.

Mr. MADDEN. There is a man whose title is property clerk, is there not, of the board of education?

Mr. MORRELL. There is a clerk; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MORRELL. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORRELL. In answer to the gentleman who asked me the question, I should like to read the following from the statement of Major Biddle, the Engineer Commissioner:

> Major BIDDLE. Yes, sir. We have a special man who is in charge, called the superintendent of repairs. He has in charge the repairs of all buildings in the District—all public District buildings. We rely a good deal, of course, on the statements of the principals of schools for information when anything goes wrong; they are there all the time and can give us that information, and if something appears to be very much out of order the repairs are made at once.

And then Colonel Biddle explained the method of the sending out of the blank, which I have already mentioned to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say that in response to and in compliance with a suggestion made by the principal of, I think it was the Central High School, the District Commissioners requested that $40,000 be set aside for repairs in that school; believing this sum to be excessive the Committee on Appropriations requested the Engineer Commissioner to make a personal examination and report back to the committee. After the personal investigation was made he reported back to the committee that $10,000 was all that was needed instead of $40,000.

Mr. MORRELL. That is just what I wanted to get away from. I want to get away from the fact that the principals of the schools shall have anything to do with it.

Mr. MADDEN. That recommendation was made by the board of education at the request of the principal of the school.

Mr. MORRELL. I understood the gentleman to say the principal of the school.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, in this connection I want to say that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] should not receive favorable consideration. He terms it unnecessary, and, I believe, used the term "vicious." I want to say that in his own city of New York the superintendent of schools comes first, and next the superintendent of buildings, and we regard the latter as one of the most essential positions in the government of our schools. We have also had an allusion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] to the fact that there are fifteen building inspectors. These are to inspect the buildings of the city, those of private individuals, firms, and corporations, and not public buildings.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In the city of New York the superintendent of buildings and supplies is charged with the designing and construction of the buildings. This provision does not give him any such power; all that it merely gives him is the charge of the repairs, which are insignificant.

Mr. GOULDEN. It gives him charge of the buildings and such other duties as the board of education may assign to him.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. GOULDEN. Well, that is a matter of opinion. The proposed amendment of the gentleman from New York will strike out one of the most essential and important sections of the provisions for schools in the city of Washington. The Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia has enough responsibility and duties aside from the care of public school buildings and the erection of new ones. The matter of supplies is not in his department and will form an important part of the work of this proposed new official should the section be adopted. I trust that Members will think it of sufficient importance to vote down the amendment and stand by the proposed bill as it has been presented by the committee.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section be closed in ten minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman makes the motion and it is adopted, it will shut off any amendments that are in contemplation. If he will confine it to this proposition, it will not cut off other amendments that gentlemen have in contemplation. I hope as the matter stands it will be voted down. There are other amendments to other parts of the section as well as to this proposition.

Mr. SIMS. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that my object is to expedite this bill. My desire is that we sit here all night, or until we finish it.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee state his motion?

Mr. SIMS. That all debate on the present section and amendments thereto close in ten minutes.

The question was taken; and the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I want to read——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Debate on the pending amendment has long ago been exhausted and there are a number of gentlemen here who desire to offer amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to read, for the information of the House, the hearings on this point before the Committee on Appropriations:

Question. What is the superintendent of repairs, whom you want to raise from $1,500 to $1,800?

Colonel BIDDLE (Engineer Commissioner). He has charge of the repairs of all of the District buildings. It takes, as you can readily see, a man of considerable executive ability to take charge of so much work. There are 200 District buildings scattered throughout the District that require a great variety of repairs.

This is the man who has a salary fixed at $1,500 that you want to raise to $3,600 to do precisely the same work. And further than that, the appropriation has been made, the man has accepted the provision, and Colonel Biddle says that he is an exceedingly competent man to do the work required. What more do gentlemen want? On the authority of the Engineer he is a competent man willing to do the work at $1,500. Now, gentlemen come in and want to make an appropriation of $3,600 to do precisely the same work.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman yield to an interruption?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. We have already provided in the District appropriation bill for that man. This proposes to create another position for a man to be in charge of only part of these buildings, at a salary of $3,600 a year.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. And it is proposed to pay two and two-fifths times as much to do a part of the work as a man can do the whole work for. That is the situation.

Mr. JOHNSON. And we have already appropriated for it.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I read further:

How many men does this superintendent have under him?

He has a few in the winter, but in the summer, while the school repairs are going on, sometimes he has about 200.

For nine months in the year but very little to do, the man that it is proposed to pay $3,600 a year to; and in the summer a considerable force for from ten to twelve weeks at the outside. I submit to the gentlemen of the House, is it not simply good business as well as economy to let the present arrangement stand, as long as there is no fault found with its efficiency?

Mr. WANGER. Is that superintendent a purchasing agent of the District—the distributer of supplies?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. No; he is not the purchasing agent. The purchasing agent is also provided for, and an appropriation made for that office.

Mr. WANGER. Are not those two offices combined in this provision?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I think they are, but I doubt very much whether you can have a carpenter and a purchasing agent in one and the same man and have him efficient.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, this section in this bill was given careful consideration by the committee, and we decided that the establishment of this position of superintendent of buildings and supplies was necessary. We believed from the information obtained at the hearings before us that there was urgent necessity that a competent person should have supervision of the school buildings in the District of Columbia. It appeared to the committee that there was a positive need for the creation of this office. Personally I am opposed as a rule to the creation of new offices or the raising of salaries, but I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], which I believe strikes out this provision, will not prevail.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, the time has not yet expired. I desire to be recognized for a word or two on this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I certainly hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will prevail. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] says that his committee gave this matter most careful consideration and attention, and that they reached the conclusion that there was a real necessity for the creation of this new place. I can not understand, if the District Committee did give this matter such careful consideration, how in the world it reached such a conclusion, because, as a matter of fact, the place already exists. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] also says we need a competent man in this very necessary place. I can relieve his anxiety on that score also, for we have the assurance of the Engineer Commissioner, Colonel Biddle, that a most competent man is filling this place at this very time, and that he is drawing only $1,500 a year for discharging the important duties imposed upon him. Yet, Mr. Chairman, this cautious District Committee, that claims to have given most careful consideration to this matter, comes here and in this bill recommends the creation of this additional place, to be filled by some one who is to discharge the very duties, or only a part of the duties, that are now being discharged by the employee who is being paid only $1,500 a year, and this careful committee proposes in this bill to give the new man $3,600 a year.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Texas permit a question?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the man who is now filling that position have assistants and a typewriter, and also a clerk?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly he does not. He does not need them.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is the gentleman aware that this particular man shall have as assistants one clerk, who shall have charge of supplies, one inspector and a janitor, one stenographer, and one typewriter?

Mr. BURLESON. I suppose that item providing for these useless places was the result of that careful consideration given this item by the District Committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. These employees now exist, with the exception of the stenographer, but they are transferred from the control of the secretary of the board into this man's jurisdiction so as to give an excuse for the creation of the new office.

Mr. BURLESON. I am prepared to believe it. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact, there is absolutely no necessity for the creation of this place, as has been shown to you from the District Appropriation Committee hearings read by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER]. The truth is we now have a most competent man filling this place, if the Engineer Commissioner can be believed. Not only have we a most competent man already filling this position, but he is drawing only $1,500 a year. Now, why should we, without imposing new duties upon him, give him $3,600? I hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will be adopted and that this whole paragraph will be stricken out. It is not necessary, it constitutes no essential part of this bill, and it does not pertain to the reorganization of the school system. It has no bearing upon whether the salaries of the teachers should be increased or not. It is an independent paragraph that can be stricken out without injuring or impairing in the least the main features of this measure, and this should be promptly done.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hold that debate is exhausted on this amendment. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move that in lines 1 and 2, page 4, the word "colored," in the first and second lines, be stricken out and the word "negro" be inserted therein. I do not wish to discuss it, and I call for a vote.

Mr. MORRELL. Will the Clerk report the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1, page 4, strike out the word "colored" and insert "negro," and the same amendment in line 2.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following two amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "Columbia," in line 18, page 3, "who shall hold said office for a term of three years and."

Also insert at the end of line 23, page 3, "The board shall have power to remove the superintendent at any time for adequate cause affecting his character and efficiency as superintendent."

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, the committee accept those amendments.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, in charge of the bill, announces that he is willing to accept the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendments were adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the board of education of the District of Columbia shall be as follows:

TEACHERS.

Class 1.	Class 2.	Class 3.	Class 4.	Class 5.	Class 6.

Assistants to directors of primary instruction, classes 4 and 5.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "music," in line 14, page 5, the following: "Group A, class 6, and teachers of."

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, the committee will accept the amendment offered by the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken; and the amendment was adopted.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "four," page 6, at the end of line 8, and insert "five;" and in that connection I desire to ask that the Clerk read the letter which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 8, strike out the word "four" and insert the word "five."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks to have the following letter read in his time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hon. IRVING P. WANGER.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed you will find the statement which you suggested I should make in regard to the salary of the librarian to the board of education.

The point I wished to make is that in proportion to the value of the work the salary is much too low. There are clerks in the employ of the present school system with little or no responsibility whose salaries range from eleven hundred to eighteen hundred dollars.

Now, the salary of librarian is given to a person whose value to the teachers of the schools is inestimable. Teachers from all parts of the city go to her for reference books upon all subjects, and are directed by her to those out of the 10,000 that will be of the greatest help.

Her ever-helpful cheerfulness and faithfulness, her elevating influence upon the young women of the Normal School, are not to be bought. They arise from beauty of character, faithful and conscientious devotion to duty.

As a normal graduate, and afterwards as a teacher in the schools, I feel competent to judge of the value of her services.

It seems that this position was undervalued by those drafting the Babcock bill, and in the cause of justice I have made bold to bring the matter to the attention of those in whose power it lies to reward real merit.

Very sincerely, yours, MIRIAM BANGS HILTON.

STATEMENT.

The librarian of the teachers' library, named in the proposed bill as "librarian to the board of education," receives at present a salary of $900.

Under the proposed bill she will, after twenty-three years of service, receive only $1,100.

She is a graduate of the Washington High and Normal schools, and has had special training in psychology, philosophy, and German at Wellesley College, Massachusetts.

In view of the fact that she has been in the service of the schools sixteen years—four years as a teacher in the graded schools and twelve years as librarian—and that hers is a single position entailing no other increase in salaries, it would seem that a "flat" salary of $1,200 a year would be just and advisable; or, if she is to be placed in a class, it should be class 5 and not class 4, as proposed.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I have no personal knowledge of the young lady who holds the position of librarian of the board of education, but this letter is the disinterested testimony of an estimable lady of this city who was a graduate of the Normal School and a teacher in one of the public schools of the District to the great value of the services rendered by the little German girl, as I understand she is, who acts as librarian of this most important library of the public school system of the District of Columbia—a library having 10,000 volumes—and who, by reason of her fine attainments and zealous devotion to duty is a daily aid and continuing inspiration to the teachers and scholars of this District. It seems to me that the testimony and appeal ought to be heeded, and that the increase granted is a very moderate one, the request for which should commend itself favorably to this committee and secure its favorable action, and I hope that my colleague will accept the amendment.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the committee, I may say that while in the judgment of the committee in the beginning that particular salary was placed in the class to which it belongs, in view of the explanation which has been made by my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER], it is the disposition of the committee to accept the amendment.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same.

H. J. Res. 141. Joint resolution for the further relief of sufferers from earthquake and conflagration on the Pacific coast.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to report the agricultural appropriation bill, and give notice that I will ask for its consideration Wednesday, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18537) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to reserve all points of order upon the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi reserves all points upon the bill. The bill, with the accompanying report, will be ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REGULATION OF SALARIES OF TEACHERS, SCHOOL OFFICERS, BOARD OF EDUCATION, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER].

Mr. MADDEN. May I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] a question?

Mr. MORRELL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to know what the duties of the librarian are?

Mr. MORRELL. The librarian of the——

Mr. MADDEN. To the board of education.

Mr. WANGER. That is a new title adopted in this bill. This is the librarian of the teachers' library, composed of 10,000 volumes—the library that is consulted by them daily, and not only by them, but by the scholars of the normal school.

Mr. MADDEN. What are all the other libraries that appear in this bill?

Mr. MORRELL. There is one at Central High School, one at the Eastern High School, one at the Western, and one at the M street; and I would like to say in further answer to the gentleman that under the old law these librarians came in under the term of "teachers," and were paid as teachers.

Mr. MADDEN. Are they teaching?

Mr. MORRELL. Simply to instruct teachers and pupils to familiarize themselves with the library and to care for the same, and were assigned to the work of the library generally.

Mr. MADDEN. Are they, as a matter of fact, teachers?

Mr. MORRELL. They are not, and for that reason they were specified in this bill as librarians.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman who has charge of this bill on the floor know any other place in this country where positions of this kind have been created or are in existence in connection with the public schools?

Mr. MORRELL. I can not answer the gentleman at the present time. I presume that there are. I can not see how the number of large school systems where they have school libraries can be managed without a librarian, besides the public libraries were established long after the establishment of the libraries in the high schools.

Mr. WANGER. If my friend will permit me, I understand this library is open at an earlier hour than the opening of the schools, until a later hour than the closing, and this lady has given up her life to this work. She has been a teacher for sixteen years—an actual teacher for four years (maybe only three years) and librarian of the teachers' library the remainder of the time under the designation of "teacher."

Mr. MADDEN. But they have a number of librarians here, and that is the thing I want to find out about, Mr. Chairman. Not this particular librarian, but the number of librarians. How many are there in the list?

Mr. WANGER. I think they are named in the bill. As I understand it they are at the different school buildings.

Mr. MADDEN. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that is an office that has nothing whatever to do with the conduct of public education in public schools—elementary schools—and that we can not afford to have librarians located in every building; and that we can not afford to have libraries located in every building which is being used for school purposes. It is evident that up to the present time no such position has been officially recognized, but that, without authority of law, somebody has assumed the right to appoint people who were intended to be engaged as teachers to positions as librarians. And now for the first time we discover that we have a library in every school in the District.

Mr. WANGER. Oh, no; not in every school.

Mr. MADDEN. How many have we?

Mr. WANGER. I think there are four high schools.

Mr. MADDEN. It does not say how many there are.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Four high schools.

Mr. MADDEN. Four schools. And this is a condition that does not exist in any other public educational institution in this country, I feel safe in saying. We have two hundred and fifty-odd thousand children attending school in the city from which I come, and no such position as this exists in the whole school system, and it ought not to exist here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This seems to be a right important matter. It opens up a new vista for our consideration. It calls our attention to the fact of the existence of an entirely new sort of appendage to the public school system—four or more librarians that have to attend to libraries for the teachers of the District; and in a town, too, where a Carnegie library exists, and two or three others, as well as the Congressional Library. This is a new idea to me—somebody to keep a library for the teachers, and to let the teacher have books, and to advise them what books to get. It requires some degree of consideration, and I will suggest to the gentleman in charge of the bill that it is now half past 5, and that the committee had better rise, so that we can sleep over it.

Mr. MORRELL. Well, in answer to the gentleman from Mississippi, I would suggest that it is very advisable, if possible, to get through this particular section of the bill, a section which affects a great many hard-working, conscientious citizens here in the District who have been on tenter hooks a long time in regard to an increase in salary. And as we seem to be practically unanimous that an increase should be granted, I trust that the gentleman will be willing that we shall conclude the consideration of this section.

Mr. TAWNEY. The bill will not go into effect until July next.

Mr. MORRELL. I know.

Mr. TAWNEY. And Congress will be in session for some time yet.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Nobody objects to the increase of the teachers' salaries. I would not object to increasing them more than this bill does. This is a new question, and it ought to be looked into by the Members, and the only way for them to do it satisfactorily is for the matter to go over. I suggest again that the gentleman move that the committee rise.

Mr. MORRELL. Would it be in order for the section to be considered as passed with the privilege of returning to the question of librarians?

Mr. GROSVENOR. You might do that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There are other provisions that gentlemen want to discuss in connection with this section. The House meets at 12 o'clock, but many of us have much to do before it meets and some of us have a great deal to do after it adjourns; hence I suggest again that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed on this amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move to strike out the last two words. I wish to call the attention of the committee to these positions of librarians.

Mr. MORRELL. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LITTLEFIELD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15961 and the bill S. 47, and had directed him to report the same with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bills as amended do pass; and also had under consideration the bill H. R. 14442, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CONDEMNATION OF INSANITARY BUILDINGS.

The first business reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was the bill (S. 47) creating a board for the condemnation of insanitary buildings in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

QUIETING TITLE TO CERTAIN LOTS IN THE DISTRICT.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. 15961) to quiet titles to certain lots in the District of Columbia.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, a motion to reconsider the several votes by which the various bills reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia had passed to-day was laid on the table.

REQUEST FROM THE SENATE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following request from the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 4886) to simplify the issue of enrollments and licenses of vessels of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the discharge of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries from the further consideration of the Senate bill, and returning the bill according to the request of the Senate?

Mr. WILLIAMS. A parliamentary inquiry. Would this require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, it would require unanimous consent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will be very sorry if it requires unanimous consent, because I will have to object.

The SPEAKER. The Senate bill has been referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and the Senate sends a request to have it returned.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the request of the Senate be complied with.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, the bill having been referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, the motion would not be in order; otherwise the Chair would be glad to entertain it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I think that this is a matter of the highest privilege, when a request is made from one House to return a measure to the other body. I think the Chair will find it is in order.

The SPEAKER. This involves discharging the committee from consideration of the bill. The Chair will see in a moment. The Chair would like to examine the question raised by the motion submitted by the gentleman from Mississippi; and submits the following personal request.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GRONNA requests leave of absence indefinitely on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the personal request will be granted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will have to object, Mr. Speaker.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 10152. An act granting certain lands to the city of Biloxi, in Harrison County, Miss., for park and cemetery purposes; and
H. R. 15910. An act to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate commutation for good conduct for United States prisoners," approved June 21, 1902.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Reference of the bill H. R. 18417 was changed from the Committee on the District of Columbia to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.), in accordance with resolution previously made, the House adjourned until Wednesday.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred, as follows:

SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 24, 1906.

Prayer by Rev. ULYSSES G. B. PIERCE, of the city of Washington.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on the request of Mr. LODGE, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

COASTWISE TRADE OF PHILIPPINE ARCHIPELAGO.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent to call up House bill 18025—the Philippine bill—which was taken up, read, and considered, and then held back on the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who informs me that he has no further objection to the measure.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18025) to regulate shipping in trade between ports of the United States and ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, between ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, and for other purposes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to make a single suggestion in reference to this bill.

Some time ago the Senate passed a bill commonly known as the "shipping bill," and the provisions of the bill now under consideration were a part of that measure. It is a matter of extreme regret to me that the body from which this bill came has not seen proper to take up the bill which was sent to it from the Senate and pass it in its entirety. That bill contemplates action which would result, in the judgment of some of us, in the revival of American shipping.

This particular provision is, in a sense, hostile to the shipping interests of the country, and were it not for the fact that there are adequate reasons why this action should be taken, I should feel it my duty to oppose its enactment. But under existing conditions I shall withhold any opposition to the passage of the pending bill and content myself by expressing the hope that in due time the other branch of Congress will see that it is the plain duty to a great industry of this country to pass the bill which was favorably acted upon by the Senate a few weeks ago.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from New Hampshire is of course aware that I agree with all he says most entirely and fully; but this bill is made necessary by the situation of the other bill and the near approach of the expiration of the time in which the coastwise law must go into effect in the Philippine Archipelago.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is as I understand it.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I wish to concur entirely in the statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to have one of the Senators or some one else explain exactly what the bill does.

Mr. FRYE. It simply extends the provisions of the coastwise trade in regard to the Philippines.

Mr. LODGE. The bill passed the House unanimously. It is simply to postpone the operation of the coastwise laws between the Philippine Islands and the United States.

Mr. CLAY. What committee does the bill come from?

Mr. LODGE. It comes from the Committee on the Philippines with a unanimous report.

Mr. CLAY. Very well.

Mr. PERKINS. I will ask to what period it extends the time?

Mr. LODGE. It extends it to the expiration of the Spanish treaty.

Mr. GALLINGER. To the year 1909.

Mr. LODGE. April 11, 1909.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALARIES OF POSTMASTERS IN COLORADO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 6th ultimo, a statement from the Auditor for the Post-Office Department showing salary accounts of certain former postmasters in Colorado in the terms between July 1, 1864, and July 1, 1874, etc.; which, on motion of Mr. TELLER, was, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIM.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting the conclusions of fact and of law filed under the act of January 20, 1885, in the French spoliation claims set out in the findings by the court relating to the vessel brig Abby, Harding Williams, master; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

FINDINGS OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings of fact filed by the court in the cause of Alphonse Mouillon v. The United States; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

COASTING DISTRICTS.

Mr. FRYE. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5572) to amend section 4348 of the Revised Statutes, establishing great coasting districts of the United States, to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report thereon. The bill is a short one, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. FULTON. I would be pleased to be informed by the Senator from Maine what change the bill makes.

Mr. FRYE. It is simply a consolidation of three districts on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. FULTON. It makes no change on the Pacific?

Mr. FRYE. It does not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend section 4348 of the Revised Statutes so as to read:

SEC. 4348. The seacoasts and navigable rivers of the United States and Porto Rico shall be divided into five great districts, the first to include all the collection districts on the seacoasts and navigable rivers between the northern boundary of the State of Maine and the southern boundary of the State of Texas; the second to consist of the island of Porto Rico; the third to include the collection districts on the seacoasts and navigable rivers between the southern boundary of the State of California and the northern boundary of the State of Washington; the fourth to consist of the Territory of Alaska; the fifth to consist of the Territory of Hawaii.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE. I ask that the report of the committee and the letter from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5572) to amend section 4348 of the Revised Statutes, establishing great coasting districts of the United States, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass without amendment.

The bill has the approval of the Commerce and Labor Department, as will appear by the letter of the Secretary, which explains the purpose and effect of the measure.

The only direct change effected by the bill is to consolidate the three great coasting districts of the Atlantic into one, thus relieving our vessels sailing from one to another of these of numerous restrictions, including the filing of manifests when carrying certain cargoes.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, April 23, 1906.

Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE,
Chairman Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

SIR: The Department has received your letter of the 10th instant, inclosing S. 5572, to amend section 4348 of the Revised Statutes, establishing great coasting districts of the United States.

Replying to your request that I furnish the committee with such suggestion as I may deem proper touching the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage, I have to state that the Department favors the bill.

The great coasting districts of the United States are now divided as follows:

First. East limits of the United States (Maine) to southern limits of Georgia.

Second. River Perdido (west boundary of Florida) to the Rio Grande.

Third. Southern limits of Georgia to river Perdido (exclusively the State of Florida).

The numerical order in section 4348, Revised Statutes, does not now follow the geographical order of customs districts, because Florida was annexed later to the United States than Louisiana.

Fourth. Pacific coast—no specific authority of law.

Fifth. Alaska. (Sec. 4358, Rev. Stat., "Navigation laws," p. 247.)

Sixth. Hawaii. (Act of April 30, 1900; sec. 98, "Navigation laws," p. 235.)

Seventh. Porto Rico. (Act of April 12, 1900, sec. 9, "Navigation laws, pp. 238–239.)

The first purpose of the bill is to bring into one concise section the various scattered statutory definitions of the great districts.

The second purpose is to simplify the legal requirements relating to the Atlantic coasting trade, confined to American vessels, and to obviate the complicated requirements of law governing the coasting trade between Atlantic and Gulf ports by consolidating the three Atlantic and Gulf districts into one great district, similar to the Pacific coast. These complicated requirements are found particularly in sections 4349, 4350, 4351, 4352, 4353, 4354, 4355, 4356, Revised Statutes. ("Navigation laws," pp. 226–230.) These sections are portions of the act of February 18, 1793, and are one hundred and thirteen years old. The conditions of the times when they were enacted have passed away, and as an examination of the sections cited will show they impose dilatory conditions no longer necessary, especially in the coasting trade of the State of Florida.

American shipping in the coasting trade, especially along the Atlantic coast, is now in keen competition with the railroads, which did not exist in 1793. The Department favors the bill as a measure of relief for American shipping.

Respectfully,
LAWRENCE O. MURRAY,
Acting Secretary.

Mr. DICK introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 51) providing for the erection of a statue of the late Hon. Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War under Presidents Lincoln and Johnson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

GRADING OF PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE EAST.

Mr. RAYNER (for Mr. GORMAN) submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $5,000 for continuing the grading of Pennsylvania avenue east from Branch avenue to the District line, intended to be proposed by Mr. GORMAN to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,732 for the purchase of lot 143, square 1282, adjoining the Jackson School building, for a playground for that school, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $25,000 for bronze medals to be presented by the Secretary of War to such volunteer officers and enlisted men as served beyond the terms of their enlistment to help to suppress the Philippine insurrection, intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FLINT submitted an amendment authorizing the Postmaster-General to use the average weight of mails ascertained during the period from February 20 to April 17, 1906, in adjusting the compensation, according to law, on such railroad routes as, in his judgment, may have been affected by the earthquake calamity in California on April 18, 1906, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the post-office appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. DRYDEN, it was Ordered, That a letter from W. E. Hoyt, on file with the Senate Committee on Pensions, in connection with the bill to pension locomotive engineers, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made on that measure.

JAMES D. VERNAY.

Mr. WARREN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 2325) for the relief of James D. Vernay.

INSURANCE CONVENTION IN CHICAGO.

On motion of Mr. BULKELEY, it was

CONDEMNATION OF INSANITARY BUILDINGS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 47) to create a board for the condemnation of insanitary buildings in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, which were, on page 2, line 7, to strike out "and by its direction;" on page 2, line 9, after the word "postmeridian," insert "peaceably;" and on page 2, line 10, strike out all after "same" down to and including "act" in line 13.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

THE EDES HOME.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4046) to incorporate the Edes Home; which were, on page 2, line 9, to strike out the comma and insert a period; and on page 2, strike out line 10, down to and including "held," line 11, and insert "The property held by the said corporation actually and exclusively used and occupied for the home provided in section 1 of this act shall while and as long as so actually and exclusively used and occupied."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

THE AMERICAN CROSS OF HONOR.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3045) to incorporate the American Cross of Honor within the District of Columbia, which was, on page 1, after line 15, insert "Congress reserves the right to amend, alter, or repeal this act."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

LAND IN PORT ANGELES, WASH.

Mr. PILES. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16954) providing for the reappraisement of certain suburban lots in the town site of Port Angeles, Wash.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to add at the end the following proviso:

Provided, That no patent shall issue to any of the lots so reappraised until the purchaser thereof has proven to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that he has expended not less than $300 in permanent improvements on each lot purchased by him.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause the reappraisement of all unsold and undisposed-of suburban lots not reserved for public purposes in the town site of Port Angeles, Wash., and all of said lots so reappraised to be subject to sale at private entry only at such reappraised price: Provided, That no patent shall issue to any of the lots so reappraised until the purchaser thereof has proven to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that he has expended not less than $300 in permanent improvements on each lot purchased by him.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CONDEMNATION OF LAND FOR STREETS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17217) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia," regulating proceedings for condemnation of land for streets.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT PASSAIC, N. J.

Mr. DRYDEN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5581) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building at Passaic, N. J.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 2, line 4, before the word "feet," to strike out "twenty" and insert "forty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase by private sale, secure by condemnation, or otherwise acquire a site for and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, with fireproof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the United States post-office in the city of Passaic, in the county of Passaic and State of New Jersey. The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved, according to law, and shall not exceed, for the site and building complete, the sum of $100,000, which is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than 40 feet, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELECTRIC POWER PLANTS IN FOREST RESERVES.

Mr. FLINT. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11490) granting the Edison Electric Company a permit to occupy certain lands for electric power plants in the San Bernardino, Sierra, and San Gabriel forest reserves, in the State of California.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMY CHAPLAINS.

Mr. BULKELEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5648) to amend section 12 of the act approved February 2, 1901, "An act to increase the efficiency of the permanent military establishment of the United States."

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. KEAN. What is the "one for Corps of Engineers?"

Mr. BULKELEY. A chaplain.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KEAN. I have no objection to its consideration.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, after the word "artillery," at the end of line 6, to insert "wherever the same occurs in said section;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 12 of the act approved February 2, 1901, "An act to increase the efficiency of the permanent military establishment of the United States," is hereby amended by inserting, after the word "artillery," wherever the same occurs in said section, the words "and one for the Corps of Engineers."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF FERNANDO J. MORENO.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 352) for the relief of the heirs of Fernando J. Moreno, deceased.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, before the word "dollars," to strike out "five thousand" and insert "nine hundred;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Mrs. Louisa Moreno, Mrs.

W. A. Blount, Mrs. E. T. Hunt, Fernando Moreno, Mason S. Moreno, and Miss Louisa Moreno, heirs of Fernando J. Moreno, deceased, the sum of $900, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation for services rendered by said Fernando J. Moreno in guarding and caring for 1,430 African slaves brought to Key West, Fla., by the United States vessels Crusader, Mohawk, and Wyandotte in the year 1860, the said Moreno being requested and directed to perform said service by the authorities of the United States while he was holding the office of United States marshal for the southern district of the State of Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, if it is agreeable to Senators at this time, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15331) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 66, after line 8, to insert:

That section 5 of an act entitled "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota," as amended by the act of Congress approved on the 27th day of June, 1902, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota,' approved January 14, 1889," is hereby amended in line 92 by inserting, after the word "lakes," the words "excepting Cooper Island in Cass Lake," and in line 94, after the word "Interior," by inserting the sentence "And Cooper Island in Cass Lake composed of the following-described pieces of land situate in the State of Minnesota, to wit: Lots 1 and 2 of section 25; lot 1 of section 26; the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter, and lots 5 and 6 of section 27; lots 1, 2, 3, and 4 of section 34; the west half of the northwest quarter, the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter, the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter, and lots 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 of section 35; lots 1, 2, 3, and 4 of section 36; all in township 146 north, range 31 west; also lot 1 of section 1; lots 1, 2, 3, and 4 of section 2, of township 145 north, range 31 west, is hereby reserved for and granted to the State of Minnesota, to be used as a State forest reserve or public park, upon condition that if at any time the State shall cease to use the said island so reserved and granted for forest reserve or park purposes the title to the same shall be forfeited and shall revert to the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Minnesota if the note I have here is correct, that there are six allotments on the island named in that amendment? If so, I assume that those people can not be deprived of their property without compensation in some form.

Mr. CLAPP. They certainly can not be. This provision of the bill can not take their allotments away from them.

Mr. GALLINGER. So that if they are there, the amendment, if adopted, would not dispossess them in any way?

Mr. CLAPP. It could not.

Mr. GALLINGER. If that is clear, I have no objection.

Mr. CLAPP. To avoid any question as to that, I will say to the Senator that there is no objection to the insertion of a proviso to that effect, although I am very clear on the point.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think, if the Senator would accept a proviso of that character, it would be more satisfactory. Do I understand the Senator will move to insert such a proviso?

Mr. CLAPP. I will attend to the matter in conference.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 69, line 20, after the date "1889," to insert "and an act entitled 'An act to authorize the sale of a part of what is known as the Red Lake Indian Reservation, in the State of Minnesota,' approved February 20, 1904;" and on page 70, line 7, after the word "much," to insert "thereof;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to cause to be made a drainage survey of the lands ceded by the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota under the act of Congress entitled "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chipewa Indians in the State of Minnesota," approved January 14, 1889, and an act entitled "An act to authorize the sale of a part of what is known as the Red Lake Indian Reservation, in the State of Minnesota," approved February 20, 1904, which remain unsold, and are wet, overflowed, or swampy in character, with a view to determining what portions thereof may be profitably and economically reclaimed by drainage, the number, location, cost, and extent of drainage ditches, canals, or improved natural water courses required to afford drainage outlets; and whether a sufficient fund for such improvement could be provided by an increase in the price at which such unsold ceded lands should be sold in the future, and the sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 70, after line 17, to insert:

That all restrictions as to sale, incumbrance, or taxation for allotments within the White Earth Reservation in the State of Minnesota, now or hereafter held by adult mixed-blood Indians, are hereby removed; and as to full bloods, said restrictions shall be removed when the Secretary of the Interior is satisfied that said adult full-blood Indians are competent to handle their own business affairs.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Minnesota if, in removing these restrictions on allotments, as provided for in this amendment, there ought not to be a provision to issue patents in fee to those people?

Mr. CLAPP. That is a matter as to which I should have no objection one way or the other. I will put in a provision to that effect if the Senator so desires.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to have the amendment amended in that particular.

Mr. CLAPP. That is, with the understanding that they have the right to patents.

Mr. GALLINGER. Precisely.

Mr. CLAPP. Not that it shall be discretionary?

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no; but that they have the right to patents.

Mr. CLAPP. I will attend to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, under the subhead "Northern Cheyennes and Arapahoes (Treaty)," on page 73, after line 8, to insert:

For the purchase of heifers and bulls for the Indians on the Northern Cheyenne Indian Reservation, Tongue River Agency, Mont., $30,000: Provided, That the expenditure of this money shall be under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, who shall purchase the cattle and regulate their distribution according to such rules and regulations as in his discretion he may deem best.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. There is no objection to the reading of the next amendment, beginning in line 16, on page 73, in relation to the Blackfeet Reservation, at this time, Mr. President, but the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], who seems to be absent at this moment, asked that it be passed over for to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.

Mr. CARTER entered the Chamber.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana is present.

Mr. CARTER. Let the amendment be read, Mr. President.

Mr. CLAPP. Very well; let it be read. I have no objection to that.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 73, after line 15, to insert:

BLACKFEET RESERVATION.

That so soon as all the lands embraced within the Blackfeet Indian Reservation shall have been surveyed the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall cause allotments of the same to be made under the provisions of the allotment laws of the United States to all persons having tribal rights or holding tribal relations and may rightfully belong on said reservation: Provided, That all water rights and privileges on or connected with streams within or adjoining said reservation shall be subject to the laws of the State of Montana, and all proceedings in any pending suit commenced by the United States praying for an injunction to enjoin the use of the waters of any such stream shall be suspended, and no like suit shall hereafter be commenced or prosecuted by the United States against any person or company actually using the water of any of the streams aforesaid for a beneficial purpose: And provided further, That there shall be allotted to each adult or head of family 80 acres of irrigable land and 120 acres of additional land valuable only for grazing purposes, or at the option of the allottee, the entire 160 acres may be taken in land valuable only for grazing purposes, and to each person under 18 years of age one-half of such acreage, respectively: Provided further, That the Holy Family Mission on Two Medicine Creek is hereby granted 320 acres of land, to be selected by the authorities of said mission, embracing the mission buildings and improvements thereon, and the Secretary of the Interior may reserve such lands as he may deem necessary or desirable for agency, school, and religious purposes; also such tract or tracts of grazing and timber lands as he may deem expedient for the use and benefit of the Indians of said reservation in common; but such reserved lands, or any part thereof, may be disposed of from time to time in such manner as the said Secretary may determine.

That upon the completion of said allotments the President of the United States shall appoint a commission consisting of three persons to inspect, appraise, and value all of the said lands that shall not have been allotted in severalty to said Indians or reserved by the Secretary of the Interior, said commission to be constituted as follows: One commissioner shall be a person holding tribal relations with said Indians, and the other two resident citizens of the State of Montana.

That within thirty days after their appointment said commissioners shall meet at some point within the Blackfeet Indian Reservation and organize by the election of one of their number as chairman. Said commission is hereby empowered to select a clerk, at a salary of not to exceed $5 per day.

That said commissioners shall then proceed to personally inspect and classify and appraise, by the smallest legal subdivisions of 40 acres each, all of the remaining lands embraced within said reservation. In making such classification and appraisement said lands shall be divided into the following classes: First, agricultural land of the first class; second, agricultural land of the second class; third, grazing land; fourth, timber land, and fifth, mineral lands: Provided, That mineral lands shall not be appraised.

That said commissioners shall be paid a salary of not to exceed $10 per day each while actually employed in the inspection and classification of said lands, such inspection and classification to be completed within nine months from the date of the organization of said commission.

That when said commission shall have completed the classification and appraisement of all of said lands and the same shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior, the land shall be disposed of under the general provisions of the homestead, mineral, and town-site laws of the United States, except such of said lands as shall have been classified as timber lands and except such sections 16 and 36 of each township, or any part thereof, for which the State of Montana has not heretofore received indemnity lands under existing laws, which sections, or parts thereof, are hereby granted to the State of Montana for school purposes. And in case either of said sections or parts thereof is lost to the State of Montana by reason of allotment thereof to any Indian or Indians, or otherwise, the governor of said State, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, is hereby authorized to select other lands not occupied or reserved within said reservation not exceeding 2 sections in any one township, which selections shall be made prior to the opening of the lands to settlement: Provided, That the United States shall pay to the said Indians for the lands in said sections 16 and 36 so granted, or the lands within said reservation selected in lieu thereof, the sum of $1.25 per acre.

That the lands so classified and appraised shall be opened to settlement and entry by proclamation of the President, which proclamation shall prescribe the time when and the manner in which these lands may be settled upon, occupied, and entered by persons entitled to make entry thereof, and no person shall be permitted to settle upon, occupy, or enter any of said lands, except as prescribed in such proclamation, until after the expiration of sixty days from the time when the same are opened to settlement and entry: Provided, That the rights of honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors of the late civil and the Spanish wars and the Philippine insurrection, as defined and described in sections 2304 and 2305 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March 1, 1901, shall not be abridged, but no entry shall be allowed under section 2306 of the Revised Statutes: Provided further, That the price of said lands shall be the appraised value thereof, as fixed by said commission, which in no case shall be less than $1.25 per acre for agricultural and grazing lands and $5 per acre for timber lands; but settlers under the homestead law who shall reside upon and cultivate the land entered in good faith for the period required by existing law shall pay one-fifth of the appraised value in cash at the time of entry and the remainder in five equal annual installments, to be paid in one, two, three, four, and five years, respectively, from and after the date of entry, and when the entryman shall have complied with all the requirements and terms of the homestead laws as to settlement and residence, and shall have all the required payments aforesaid, he shall be entitled to a patent for the lands entered: Provided, That he shall make his final proofs in accordance with the homestead laws within seven years from date of entry, and that aliens who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States may become such entrymen, but before making final proof and receiving patent they must receive their full naturalization papers: And provided further, That the fees and commissions at the time of commutation or final entry shall be the same as are now provided by law where the price of land is $1.25 per acre: Provided, That if any entryman fails to make such payments, or any of them, within the time stated, or to make final proof within seven years from date of entry, all rights in and to the land covered by his entry shall at once cease, and any payments theretofore made shall be forfeited and the entry shall be forfeited and canceled: Provided, That nothing in this act shall prevent homestead settlers from commuting their entries under section 2301, Revised Statutes, by paying for the land entered the price fixed by said commission, receiving credit for payments previously made.

That if, after the approval of the classification and appraisement, as provided herein, there shall be found lands within the limits of the reservation under irrigation projects deemed practicable under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 17, 1902, known as the "reclamation act," said lands shall be subject to withdrawal and be disposed of under the provisions of said act, and settlers shall pay, in addition to the cost of construction and maintenance provided therein, the appraised value, as provided in this act, into the reclamation funds: And provided further, That all lands hereby opened to settlement remaining undisposed of at the end of five years from the taking effect of this act shall be sold to the highest bidder for cash, at not less than $1.25 per acre, under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior; and any lands remaining unsold ten years after said lands shall have been opened to entry shall be sold to the highest bidder, for cash, without regard to the minimum limit above stated: Provided, That not more than 160 acres of land shall be sold to any one person or company.

That the lands within said reservation not already previously entered, whether classified as agricultural, grazing, or timber lands, shall be subject to exploration, location, and purchase under the general provisions of the United States mineral and coal land laws, at the prices therein fixed, except that no mineral or coal exploration, location, or purchase shall be permitted upon any lands allotted to an Indian.

That lands classified and returned by said commission as timber lands shall be sold and disposed of by the Secretary of the Interior, under sealed bids to the highest bidder for cash at not less than $5 per acre, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe: Provided, That the said timber lands shall be sold in tracts not exceeding 40 acres, with preference right of purchase to actual settlers, including Indian allottees residing in the vicinity, at the highest price bid.

That after deducting the expenses of the commission of classification, appraisement, and sale of lands, and such other incidental expenses as shall have been necessarily incurred, including the cost of survey of said lands, the balance realized from the proceeds of the sale of the lands in conformity with this act shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and placed to the credit of said Indian tribe. Not exceeding one-third of the total amount thus deposited in the Treasury, together with one-third of the amount of the principal of all other funds now placed to the credit of or which is due said tribe of Indians from all sources, shall be expended from time to time by the Secretary of the Interior as he may deem advisable for the benefit of said Indians, in the construction and maintenance of irrigation ditches, the purchase of stock cattle, horses, and farming implements, and in their education and civilization. The remainder of all funds deposited in the Treasury, realized from such sale of lands herein authorized, together with the remainder of all other funds now placed to the credit of or that shall hereafter become due to said tribe of Indians, shall, upon the date of the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of the allotments of land authorized by this act, be allotted in severalty to the members of the tribe, the persons entitled to share as members in such distribution to be determined by said Secretary; the funds thus allotted and apportioned shall be placed to the credit of such individuals upon the books of the United States Treasury for the benefit of such allottees, their legatees, or heirs. The President may, by Executive order, from time to time order the distribution and payment of such funds or the interest accruing therefrom to such individuals members of the tribe as in his judgment would be for the best interest of such individuals to have such distribution made, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe therefor: Provided, That so long as the United States shall hold the funds as trustee for any member of the tribe, the Indian beneficiary shall be paid interest thereon annually at the rate of 4 per cent per annum.

That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $65,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay for the lands granted to the State of Montana and for lands reserved for agency and school purposes, at the rate of $1.25 per acre; also the sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to survey, classify, and appraise the lands of said reservation as provided herein, and also to defray the expense of the appraisement and survey of said town sites, the latter sums to be reimbursable out of the funds arising from the sale of said lands.

That nothing in this act contained shall in any manner bind the United States to purchase any part of the land herein described, except sections 16 and 36 or the equivalent in each township that may be granted to the State of Montana, the reserved tracts mentioned in section 2 for agency and school purposes, or to dispose of said land except as provided herein, or to guarantee to find purchasers for said lands or any part thereof, it being the intention of this act that the United States shall act as trustee for said Indians to dispose of said lands and to expend and pay over the proceeds received from the sale thereof only as received.

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to reserve and set aside for town-site purposes, and to survey, lay out, and plat into town lots, streets, alleys, and parks not less than 80 acres of said land at or near the present settlements of Browning and Babb, and each of such other places as the Secretary of the Interior may deem necessary or convenient for town sites, in such manner as will best subserve the present needs and the reasonable prospective growth of said settlements. Such town sites shall be surveyed, appraised, and disposed of as provided in section 2381 of the United States Revised Statutes: Provided, That any person who, at the date when the appraisers commence their work upon the land, shall be an actual resident upon any one such lot and the owner of substantial and permanent improvements thereon, and who shall maintain his or her residence and improvements on such lot to the date of his or her application to enter, shall be entitled to enter at any time prior to the day fixed for the public sale, and at the appraised value thereof, such lot and any one additional lot of which he or she may also be in possession and upon which he or she may have substantial and permanent improvements: Provided further, That before making entry of any such lot or lots the applicant shall make proof to the satisfaction of the register and receiver of the land district in which the land lies of such residence, possession, and ownership of improvements, under such regulations as to time, notice, manner, and character of proof as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided further, That in making their appraisal of the lots so surveyed it shall be the duty of the appraisers to ascertain the names of the residents upon and occupants of any such lots, the character and extent of the improvements thereon, and the name of the reputed owner thereof, and to report their findings in connection with their report of appraisal, which report of findings shall be taken as prima facie evidence of the facts therein set out. All such lots not so entered prior to the day fixed for the public sale shall be offered at public outcry in their regular order with the other unimproved and unoccupied lots: Provided, however, That no lot shall be sold for less than $10: And provided further, That said lots when surveyed shall approximate 50 by 150 feet in size.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.

Mr. CLAPP. On page 82, line 22, in the amendment of the committee, after the word "Montana," are the words "the reserved tracts mentioned in section 2." That should be changed so as to read "the reserved tracts hereinbefore mentioned." I think there will be no objection to making that change now.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly not. I understand the committee amendment goes over, and I reserve the point of order upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 82, line 22, after the word "tracts," it is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting the word "hereinbefore;" and after the word "mentioned," in the same line, by striking out the words "in section 2;" so as to read:

That nothing in this act contained shall in any manner bind the United States to purchase any part of the land herein described, except sections 16 and 36 or the equivalent in each township that may be granted to the State of Montana, the reserved tracts hereinbefore mentioned for agency and school purposes, or to dispose of said land except as provided herein, or to guarantee to find purchasers for said lands or any part thereof, it being the intention of this act that the United States shall act as trustee for said Indians to dispose of said lands and to expend and pay over the proceeds received from the sale thereof only as received.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The committee amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, under the subhead "Winnebagoes (Treaty)," on page 86, after line 4, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to pay to the Santee Sioux Indians in Nebraska and the Ponca Indians in Nebraska the shares of said Indians in the principal permanent fund appropriated and placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Sioux Nation of Indians by the seventeenth section of the act of Congress approved March 2, 1889 (Stat. L., vol. 25, p. 895): Provided, That the shares of minors until they become of age, and the shares of incompetents, shall remain in the Treasury, and the interest on such shares may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be paid to the parents or legally appointed guardians of such minors and incompetents under such regulations as he may prescribe; or he may direct that the share of any minor or incompetent be paid to the parent or legal guardian, on the recommendation of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, if deemed necessary for their best interests: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may withhold any of the payments herein provided for if in his judgment it would be to the best interests of the member entitled to said payment to do so. And so much of the act of April 21, 1904 (vol. 33, Stat. L., p. 201), as relates to retaining minors' and incompetents' shares in the Treasury is hereby amended so as to permit the shares of the tribal trust funds belonging to minors or incompetents to be paid in like manner to the parents or legal guardians.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 87, after line 8, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Albert H. Raynolds or his personal representatives, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,290.49, for and on account of two United States Indian vouchers in the amounts, respectively, of $907.98 and $1,382.51, issued on the 26th day of March, 1877, to Dwight J. McCann, an Indian freight contractor, and cashed by the said Albert H. Raynolds, and which said vouchers were allowed for payment by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on the 2d day of May, 1877, and afterwards refused.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 88, in line 1, after the word "them," to insert "Reuben Cabana, Lewis Dick, Margaret La Flesche Diddock, Henry Warner, Roy Owens D. Stabler, Ne ka ga he, or Noah La Flesche, Ta in ge na Cook, James B. Atkin, Omaha allottees;" in line 4, after the word "allottees," to strike out "Louis Dick and Ida C. Shott, Elsie Grace Pilcher, William H. Campbell, Henry Guitar, Harriet L. Pilcher, Me khu bae, or Anna Mary Walker, Omaha allottees Nos. 962, 916, 492, 892, 420, 366, and 369, respectively; David St. Cyr, Daniel Rice, Alexander St. Cyr, Charles Raymond, Louis Armell, Louis St. Cyr, Mrs. Elsie E. Paulson, nee Perry, Mrs. Henrietta Lemmon, and Henry Lemmon, Winnebago allottees Nos. 248, 419, 139, 338, 237, 245, 509, 132, and 136, respectively; Mary Whiting, Ponca (Nebraska) allottee No. 11; Rosa Baker, Emma N. Post, Mary Knudsen;" in line 22, after the name "Mary Knudsen," to insert "Bertha F. Knudsen;" and in line 22, after the name "Bertha F. Knudsen," to strike out "Buffalo Chip, White Dog, Frank Sherman, Runs Bowing or William Elk, William Bear, and Mary Lesor, Ponca (Nebraska) allottees Nos. 39, 106, 20, 2, 100, 88, 84, 95, and 133, respectively; Josephine Amell, Winnebago allottee No. 235; Zally Rulo, Ponca (Nebraska) allottee No. 83; George W. Dupuis, Koyakewin, William Holmes, Mary Rockwood, Henry Ross, Frank H. Young, Samuel Baskin, John Hoffman, David Thomas, Joseph Coursoll, jr., Samuel Thomas, Cecilia Coursoll, Julia Rouillard, Frederick A. Dupuis, Amelia Jones, Eliza Rouillard, Edward Mackey, Andrew Jackson Felix, David Mazakute, Henry Felix, Wakinyangi or Samuel, Alfred Dupuis, Samuel Campbell, Mary Coursoll, Thomas Whipple, Jannie Cox, Reuben H. Cahney, Sarah Sheridan, Tae hu tam be or Harvey Warner, Ge u ka or Charles Stabler, Peter Felix, jr., Hin han skaden or Thomas Whiteowl, Dennie Felix, James Hemans, Charles Wicanhpidutawin, Bushman Chapman, Wacanga, George Goodteacher, Asdohewin, John Halfiron, David Boy, Hupojanjanwin, Samuel Stone, Andrew Sherman, Wospimaniwin, Phillip Webster, Joseph Paypay, Sarah Jones, Cantanna or Thomas Whipple, Wihaki or Lina Whipple, Thomas Rouillard, Samuel Whipple, August Trudell, John Ross, and Joseph Samuels, Santee Sioux allottees Nos. 195, 32, 839, 179, 758, 99, 844, 359, 427, 53, 425, 76, 831, 71, 816, 830, 677, 710, 394, 709, 386, 194, 821, 74, 807, 246, 314, 292, 508, 396, 708, 468, 714, 363, 375, 650, 15, 100, 344, 204, 788, 349, 311, 379, 50, 326, 472, 126, 809, 810, 828, 396, 548, 513, and 826, respectively; on page 90, line 23, after the word "respectively," to insert "Edward Blacksmith, Maud N. Dupuis, Louis Frenier, Nagiiyoptewin, David Whale, Charles Hedges, allottee No. 46; John B. Wapaha, allottee No. 234; Samuel Hoffman, allottee No. 343, Santee Sioux schedule;" and on page 91, line 3, after the word "schedule," to strike out "Fannie Baker, Rosebud Sioux allottee No. 1, Sioux Ceded Tract; James Garvie, Santee allottee No. 15;" so as to make the clause read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to issue fee-simple patents to the following parties for the lands heretofore allotted them: Reuben Cabana, Lewis Dick, Margaret La Flesche Diddock, Henry Warner, Roy Owens D. Stabler, Ne ka ga he, or Noah La Flesche, Ta in ge na Cook, James B. Atkin, Omaha allottees; Bertha F. Knudsen; Edward Blacksmith, Maud N. Dupuis, Louis Frenier, Nagiiyoptewin, David Whale, Charles Hedges, allottee No. 46; John B. Wapaha, allottee No. 234; Samuel Hoffman, allottee No. 343, Santee Sioux schedule; and the issuance of said patents shall operate as a removal of all restrictions as to the sale, incumbrance, or taxation of the lands so patented.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 91, after line 7, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, issue patent in fee to Good Hawk, Ponca (Nebraska) allottee No. 199, for such portion of the land allotted him as he may so approve, to be sold under direction of said Secretary and the issuance of said patent shall operate to remove all restrictions as to the sale, incumbrance, or taxation of the land so patented.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. In this connection and at this point I desire to offer the amendments I send to the desk which have been sent here by the Department. The paper will show where the respective names of allottees ought to be inserted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendments will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 62, line 10, after the word "them," it is proposed to insert the words "John Dupins, Sac and Fox of Iowa allottee;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to issue fee-simple patents to the following parties for the lands heretofore allotted them: John Dupins, Sac and Fox of Iowa allottee, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. Also on page 88, line 4, after the word "allottees," it is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting the words "Millie Neff, Sac and Fox allottee;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to issue fee-simple patents to the following parties for the lands heretofore allotted them: Reuben Cannba, Lewis Dick, Margaret La Flesche Diddock, Henry Warner, Roy Owens D. Stabler, Ne ka ga he, or Noah La Flesche, Ta in ge na Cook, James B. Atkin, Omaha allottees; Millie Neff, Sac and Fox allottee, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. Also on page 113, line 18, after the word "allottee," it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by inserting the words "Minnie Plumb, Mississippi Sac allottee;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to issue fee-simple patents to the following parties for the lands hertofore allotted them: Per mam su or Comanche Jack, Comanche allottee No. 2025, Mary McCoy, Sac and Fox allottee, Isaac McCoy, Ottawa allottee, Minnie Plumb, Mississippi Sac allottee, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 91, after line 14, to insert:

That John Oldman, Santee Sioux allottee Nos. 162 and 163, to whom a patent has been issued containing restrictions on alienation, may sell and convey his allotment, but such conveyance shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and when so approved shall convey full title to the purchaser the same as if a final patent without restrictions had been issued to the allottee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Carson School," on page 92, after line 21, to insert:

That in addition to the allotment in severalty of lands in the Walker River Indian Reservation in the State of Nevada, and the selection and setting apart for the use in common of the Indians nonirrigable, grazing lands therein, as provided by the joint resolution of June 19, 1902 (32 Stat., p. 744), the Secretary of the Interior shall, before any of said lands are open to disposition under any public-land law, select and set apart for the use in common of the Indians of said reservation such tract or tracts of timber land therein at one or more places as will subserve the reasonable requirements of said Indians for fuel and improvements.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 93, after line 8, to insert:

For the purpose of purchasing from the State of Nevada lots 2, 3, and 4, section 13, township 47 north, range 38 east, Mount Diablo meridian (48.8 acres), for allotment to Pah Ute Indians in connection with adjoining public land, $70, or as much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of line 2, on page 94.

Mr. CARTER. While the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is present I desire to recur to the amendment, on page 39, concerning which I made a brief statement the other day of possible conditions which the amendment is intended to meet. On the day following that brief discussion I was called upon by Mr. Hemphill, formerly a member of the House, and at present a practicing lawyer in this city, who advised me that the conditions outlined briefly were substantially the actual conditions this amendment was intended to meet and cover.

It will be observed that the amendment directs the Court of Claims to determine the reasonable value of certain services rendered to the Indians named in the amendment. Mr. Hemphill advised me that contracts were made in the year 1902 between the Indians and a firm of lawyers in the city of Cincinnati, Pogue & Pogue. By the terms of the contracts referred to each Indian—and there were a great many of them; hundreds, possibly thousands—was to pay $5, and likewise the tribe was to pay 25 per cent upon the aggregate amount involved or saved in the course of the proceeding.

It became obvious that the fee thus provided for would in the aggregate be very exorbitant and unusual, and to avoid controversy in connection with the matter and to secure what seemed to be a just and equitable fee in lieu of that specified in the contract this proposed reference to the Court of Claims was devised as a means of reaching a fair estimate of the value of the services rendered. Should this amendment not be adopted, as I understand from Mr. Hemphill's statement, the provisions of the contract will apply, and the fee under the contract will reach very large proportions.

It seems to me under such circumstances the amendment is intended to protect the Indians against a contract improvident in its terms as to them and inconsiderately executed at the time of its execution. In this view the amendment seems to be a meritorious one, and I believe the judgment of the Court of Claims will probably be for a less amount than the contract calls for.

Mr. LODGE. I do not recall that I opposed the amendment. If I did——

Mr. CARTER. I understood a point of order was opposed to the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. The amendment on page 39?

Mr. CARTER. On page 39, authorizing and empowering the Court of Claims——

Mr. LODGE. No.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will say to the Senator from Montana that no point of order seems to have been recorded against the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I do not recall making any opposition to those amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment was passed over.

Mr. CARTER. It was passed over?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. As I understood, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] at the time desired that the point of order be withheld.

Mr. LODGE. I made a point of order on a later amendment; that in regard to certain Cherokee allottees. I do not think I made any point of order on this amendment. I do not recall it.

Mr. CARTER. This is the matter to which my attention was directed.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to this amendment, and I do not recall making a point of order against it.

Mr. CLAPP. To the amendment on what page does the Senator from Montana refer?

Mr. LODGE. The amendment on pages 39 and 40 is the one the Senator from Montana was speaking about. I do not recall making any objection to the amendment. I have none, and I do not remember making any point of order.

Mr. CLAPP. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to object and to make the point of order, and the amendment was passed over, although the question I asked to be heard on——

Mr. LODGE. I raised the point of order on a later amendment. The request that it be passed over must have been made by some other Senator.

Mr. CARTER. I presume, then, there is no objection to the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. So far as I am concerned there is not. I do not know whether any other Senator made the point.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the amendment at the end of page 39? The Chair hears none; and without objection, it is agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. While we are on this portion of the bill, I wish to present an amendment to be inserted on page 41, after line 22.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the committee amendment already adopted on page 41, after line 22, it is proposed to insert:

Every full-blood Cherokee, Creek, Seminole, Choctaw, or Chickasaw, who heretofore has been or hereafter shall be identified as such by the Commission or Commissioner, shall be allotted by the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes, prior to the final closing of the citizenship rolls by the Secretary of the Interior, and no personal neglect on the part of such full-blood Indian to apply for allotment or to make the proof necessary to the enrollment or allotment of such Indian shall prevent the said allotment.

Mr. CLAPP. There is no objection to the amendment to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will regard the amendment of the committee as open to amendment; the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment, without objection, is agreed to; and the amendment as amended is agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. In this connection I desire to offer an amendment. It is possible the one just offered covers the point. If it does, we can fix it in conference.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment just adopted, after line 22, on page 41, it is proposed to insert the following:

No distinction shall be made in the enrollment of full-blood Mississippi Choctaws who have been identified by the United States Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, and who have removed to the Indian Territory prior to the closing of the rolls by the Secretary of the Interior, and who shall have furnished proof thereof, but such Choctaws shall be treated in all respects as other Choctaw Indians resident in the Choctaw Nation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will regard the amendment just adopted as still open to amendment; the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota to it is agreed to, in the absence of objection; and the amendment as amended is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 94, after line 19, to insert:

That the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to construct an additional building to the Indian school at Santa Fe, N. Mex., the building to be used for the purposes of a dining room.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 97, after line 11, to insert:

WAHPETON INDIAN SCHOOL.

For the support and education of 100 Indian pupils at the Indian school at Wahpeton, N. Dak., $16,700.

For pay of superintendent of said school, $1,500.

For minor improvements, $5,000.

For purchasing live stock and equipment of building, $6,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

In all, $29,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 98, after line 10, to insert:

That a part of the land reserved by General Orders, No. 17, of the War Department, dated August 28, 1876, for military purposes, but now abandoned, and subject to disposal under the act of Congress approved July 5, 1884 (23 Stat. L., p. 103), to wit: Part of sections 30 and 31, township 153 north, range 65 west, and part of sections 25, 26, 27, 35, and 36, in township 153 north, range 66 west (known as "Grahams Island"), in the State of North Dakota, be, and the same is hereby, restored to the public domain and declared to be public lands of the United States: Provided, That the lands so restored shall, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be held for a period of twelve months, subject to allotments to the Turtle Mountain band of Chippewa Indians, in accordance with the provisions of the amended agreement with said band approved April 21, 1904 (33 Stat. L., p. 194).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 99, after line 12, to insert:

That until otherwise provided by law, all water for the use of the Indian school located at Bismarck, N. Dak., shall be furnished by the Bismarck Water Company at such price as may be agreed upon between said company and the Secretary of the Interior, not exceeding 30 cents per thousand gallons. And there is hereby appropriated for the purchase of such water, for the year ending June 30, 1907, the sum of $400, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 99, after line 21, to insert:

That Michael Okinyanwastena, Devils Lake allottee No. 207; Johnnie Heikoyagmani, Devils Lake allottee No. 209, and Wasicuka, Devils Lake allottee No. 526, to whom trust patents have been issued containing restriction on alienation, may sell and convey all or part of their allotments under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, and any conveyances made hereunder shall be subject to his approval and when so approved shall convey full title to the purchasers the same as if a final patent without restrictions had been issued to the respective allottees.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 101, line 19, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For support and civilization of the Kansas Indians, Oklahoma Territory, including agricultural assistance and pay of employees, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 103, after line 13, to insert:

KICKAPOOS.

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed to immediately cause to be paid to those Kicking Mexican Kickapoo allottees who, under the act of Congress of March 3, 1893, elected to leave in the Treasury their share of the fund provided for in Article V of said act, the sum of money to their credit, together with interest thereon, as provided by said act, and as also provided by the act of June 10, 1896; the shares of minors to be paid to the parents or next of kin having the care and custody of said minors, the shares of deceased persons to be paid to their heirs; all of said payments to be made upon claim through the Border National Bank, of Eagle Pass, Tex.; and for the purpose of carrying this provision into effect there is hereby appropriated the sum of $40,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any funds in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the same to be immediately available.

Mr. LODGE. Reserving the point of order, which clearly lies against this amendment, I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment. I move to strike out, on page 104, lines 1 and 2, the words "all of said payments to be made upon claim through the Border National Bank, of Eagle Pass, Tex."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts proposes an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "heirs," in line 1, page 104, it is proposed to strike out the following:

All of said payments to be made upon claim through the Border National Bank, of Eagle Pass, Tex.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to know why the Senator from Massachusetts desires to strike out those words.

Mr. LODGE. For the following reasons, which were furnished me by the Interior Department, and which seem to me very sound reasons: This paragraph directs that all these payments shall be made through a certain bank, the Border National Bank, of Eagle Pass. Thus those Indians who are in Oklahoma must send their claims to the Border National Bank before they can be paid. Whether, as is suggested by the Department, this is—intended as an inducement to get those who desire to stay on their lands in Oklahoma to go to Mexico, or else suffer a great inconvenience in getting the money that the paragraph carries, it should not be overlooked that the Border National Bank has been concerned in the payments heretofore made to these Indians in Mexico, and if the statements of responsible officers of the Department can be believed it has been a party to a most outrageous course of procedure. When these payments were made, the Indians, through their conservator, were brought to this bank, where the checks were cashed and the Indians given the number of dollars called for in Mexican money—

That is, they were United States checks, and the bank paid the Kickapoos living in Mexico in Mexican dollars. They were entitled to United States money, of course, which they could take over the border and get twice as much for as they could for a Mexican dollar—

Thus they received approximately half the value of their checks. Moreover, the cashier of this bank is the party before whom the discredited deeds taken by Martin J. Bentley for the allotments of seven Kickapoos near Shawnee were executed. The evidence connects him as a party with the entire transaction, and this Office has recommended his prosecution, because it believes that the acts he did in these cases were criminal.

Those are my reasons for objecting to it, and I think they are good reasons. I think the Department can be trusted to select a bank.

Mr. TELLER. This bank was selected at the request of the Indians, because they have been in the habit of doing their business through that bank, and because the bank officers speak Spanish. There is not a particle of evidence worthy of any consideration that in the slightest degree reflects upon any man connected with that bank. We brought before the committee men of as high character as anybody connected with the Indian Office—a Member of Congress from Texas and other gentlemen living in the neighborhood—who testified to the high character of all these gentlemen; and there is not any foundation for that statement, whether it comes from the Secretary or the Commissioner or anybody else.

These Indians, with the exception of a few, have left the United States. They have gone into Mexico, and intend to remain there. A decided effort has been made by the Department to prevent them from going there to live as they want to live. The committee, after a careful examination and, as they supposed, with the approval of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs—at least I so understood, and I think other members of the committee did—finally agreed that this payment should be made in this way.

Mr. LODGE. I understand the Department is very anxious to have these Mexican Indians eliminated entirely from the bill, paid off and disposed of. The fact that they live in Mexico does not seem to be any good reason why they should not get the face value of their checks.

Mr. TELLER. There is no danger that they will not get the proper value of their checks.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. Wait a moment.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. TELLER. The Department is deprived of no privilege or right whatever as to the payment of this money. They are allowed to pay it simply through that bank.

Mr. LODGE. They are compelled to pay it through that bank.

Mr. TELLER. Well, they are compelled to pay it through that bank.

Mr. LODGE. There are other banks in Eagle Pass. It is very unusual in passing laws here to pick out a bank and say——

Mr. TELLER. I do not know whether there is any other bank in Eagle Pass.

Mr. LODGE. The Department says there are other banks. It can easily be determined.

Mr. TELLER. If the Department object to that bank, they should have objected to it before the committee. They did not object.

Mr. LODGE. Whether the Department objects or not, I object to selecting one bank and saying that that bank shall have the Government business in that town. My liberty of objection is not taken away from me because——

Mr. TELLER. This is a matter——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator from Colorado whether it is not a fact that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs was before the committee upon this subject, and whether he gave any evidence whatever relative to these Indians heretofore not having been paid the full sum called for by their checks?

Mr. TELLER. There was no evidence of that kind offered by anybody, as I understand.

Mr. McCUMBER. And yet I understand that the Commissioner was brought before the committee, and did testify before the committee, in order that we might learn of any objections he had or the Department might have to the removal of these Indians or the payment of these Indians or their treatment by Mr. Bentley. I heard no evidence of that character.

Mr. TELLER. The statement made by the Senator from North Dakota is absolutely correct.

For one, I do not hesitate to say here and now that I was not pleased with the conduct of the Commissioner. He had some objection to Mr. Bentley, and undoubtedly he had some prejudice against Mr. Bentley, and he had every opportunity to present any grievance that he had against Mr. Bentley. He did not present it. Through some agent there was an attack made upon Mr. Bentley, that Mr. Bentley's character was sustained beyond a question before the committee.

I say again there is no evidence on which to found that statement. There was none before the committee; and if there was such evidence, the Commissioner was very derelict if he did not bring it before us.

Mr. LODGE. I do not want to delay the bill. I make the point of order that this involves an appropriation from the Treasury of the United States and is not estimated for, and that it is general legislation, also.

Mr. TELLER. There is nothing in the point of order. This is money belonging to the Indians.

Mr. LODGE. I think the Senator will find there is something in it before he gets through.

Mr. TELLER. This is money belonging to the Indians. It is private money. It does not belong to the tribe; it belongs to the Indians. It is their lease money we are talking about now—money that was put into the Treasury when Senator Pettigrew was chairman of the committee.

Mr. LODGE. It certainly is a very unusual thing to describe it as "any funds in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. TELLER. Oh, well, of course it is the appropriation of money, but it is the Indians' money—money standing to their credit.

Mr. LODGE. It is not so described here.

Mr. TELLER. It is just as we always make these appropriations; precisely.

Mr. LODGE. That does not affect the point of order that it is not estimated for.

Mr. CLAPP. I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the recital of the bill itself.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I see.

Mr. CLAPP. The Indians elected to leave this money in the Treasury, and this provides for paying it over to them.

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed to immediately cause to be paid to those Kicking Mexican Kickapoo allottees, who, under the act of Congress of March 3, 1893, elected to leave in the Treasury their share of the fund provided for in Article V of said act—

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I see that. The amendment is open to the point of order that it is general legislation.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to ask the Senator a question. If these Indians are paid this money, it will be paid to them in checks of the United States. Those checks are good in Mexico as well as in Eagle Pass, Tex., are they not?

Mr. CLAPP. The reason for designating that the payment should be made at Eagle Pass, as I remember it, is this: Those Indians are in Mexico. I think there was a serious complaint that they should not be compelled to come up to Oklahoma.

Mr. LODGE. The Oklahoma Indians are in Oklahoma.

Mr. CLAPP. There are very few of them.

Mr. LODGE. They will have to go to Eagle Pass.

Mr. CLAPP. They are on their way; and it certainly would be a convenience to pay them down there somewhere.

Mr. LODGE. Why should this one bank be selected, and why should it be provided by law that the Indians shall be paid through this one bank? It is most unusual legislation.

Mr. TELLER. I will tell the Senator why.

Mr. LODGE. Why not say "any bank?" What is the objection to saying "any bank in Eagle Pass?"

Mr. TELLER. I do not know whether there is another bank there.

Mr. LODGE. We can easily ascertain. I will soon find that out.

Mr. TELLER. This is the bank through which the Indians have been paid before.

Mr. LODGE. I will soon inform the Senator on that point.

Mr. CLAPP. I will state why this particular bank was selected. The committee having this matter in charge spent several days on it. One of the questions involved was with respect to this bank, and during the progress of the examination it developed that this is a bank which is managed by men of high character and standing, and we knew of no other bank there.

Mr. LODGE. Against one of whom the Department recommended prosecution.

Mr. TELLER. Without the slightest evidence on the face of the earth.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not know anything about it. I have not studied the case.

Mr. TELLER. We have.

Mr. LODGE. But I know perfectly well that a prosecution has been recommended.

Mr. TELLER. That is all there has been. There has been no attempt to prosecute anybody. There was no offense whatever.

Mr. LODGE. But why select a bank against which a criminal prosecution has been recommended and not allow any other bank in the same town to do the business?

Mr. TELLER. There was no objection made to it by the Commissioner.

Mr. LODGE. I meant a prosecution against Bentley, an officer of the bank. I did not mean against the bank; I meant against the cashier. I want to be exact.

Mr. TELLER. The Commissioner was before the committee, I think, practically every day for two weeks, and, at least so far as I am concerned, we never heard any objection to paying it through this bank. If he made any, I never heard of it.

Mr. LODGE. The Commissioner further says:

> If it is decided that these Indians must be paid at Eagle Pass, why should this bank be designated when it is a fact that there are other banks in that city which have refused to countenance the practices usually prevailing when the Indians were paid in that city?

They make the distinct charge that those Indians were paid in Mexican dollars on the United States Treasury.

Mr. TELLER. There is not any evidence of it, and it is not true, either.

Mr. LODGE. He says the evidence is the reports of the officers of the Department. I know nothing more than that. Of course it is easy to say that there is no evidence.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I should like to say a word about this matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. When this matter came up I was greatly prejudiced against Mr. Bentley. It was on the ex parte statements that had been made to us. We spent days on this matter. We had the Commissioner with us days there. When we got through, while it may not be of any value to anybody else, I became satisfied that this man Bentley was acting in the utmost good faith with these Indians. There never was a suggestion before the committee that the Indians had been paid in any improper manner or that they had been paid in Mexican money, nor was there the slightest objection made to making this bank the agency through which the payments should be made.

The bank happened to be selected because in the course of the investigation we had occasion to make inquiry about this bank, and found that the men in charge of it were men of high character, and we naturally selected them. There was no other reason for mentioning this bank any more than any other bank. But the charge now as to misconduct on the part of this bank is rather a singular procedure in view of the long time spent in this investigation, and the Department being represented so much before the committee in the investigation.

Mr. LODGE. There are two banks there—the Border National Bank and the First National Bank. The First National Bank is the older bank of the two, with larger deposits, larger capital, and so on. It seems to me that it is unusual to select one bank where there are two, and to say it must be paid through that bank.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, it is not unusual, I think, if the Senator will recall that they are doing the business in this bank.

Mr. LODGE. I mean it is unusual to do it by the law. Of course the Treasury and other Departments have to make payments to a bank and they select the bank, but here Congress comes in and says it shall be paid through a particular bank, to which the Department objects.

Mr. DUBOIS. Of course this does not exactly answer what the Senator is saying, but there has been a good deal of trouble regarding the payments to the Kickapoo Indians. There are in the Treasury about $33,000 which belong to them individually. Other Indians of the same band have been paid their individual money, amounting to two or three hundred dollars apiece. These Indians did not want to take the money individually. They refused to take it out of the Treasury. It was appropriated to them, but they wanted to buy land with it. The Departments have caused them no end of trouble. Sometimes they make them go away back to Oklahoma from this place to get their money. These men can draw this money at any time they want, but they have not drawn it for the reason stated. For convenience, in order to acquire the land in Mexico where they desire to reside, and on which they have an option, there was no apparent reason why the committee should not indicate that they should do their business through this bank there. They are certainly entitled to this money per capita and to have it paid to them in any way that they select, it seems to me.

The committee wants to get rid of them and let them go to Mexico and stay there, and they want to get rid of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. So does the Department. The Commissioner says he is anxious above all things to have these Indians eliminated and get them out of the bill and out of the law, and get them into Mexico.

Mr. TELLER. He has done all he could to keep them from going; that is certain.

Mr. LODGE. I do not see how it keeps these Indians from going or gets rid of them by prescribing that their money shall be paid at a particular bank. It seems to me that if you paid them the money they would find ways to cash it. It is not very difficult to cash a check.

Mr. DUBOIS. It is very difficult for them to cash a check where they are; there is not enough money around in that immediate vicinity. This is 109 miles, I understand, from where they are located in Mexico, and Eagle Pass is the nearest point, I think, where they can have checks cashed.

Mr. LODGE. There are two banks there. A national bank is very ready always to cash a Government draft.

Mr. DUBOIS. But a check for them, where they live, is rather an inconvenient piece of property.

Mr. LODGE. Provide that they shall be paid at Eagle Pass, if that is thought best, but why specify the bank?

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to say, Mr. President, that there can be no question, so far as the evidence establishes the fact, that the Department and the Indian agent where these Indians were located, sought by almost every possible means to keep them in the United States and prevent them from going over to Mexico. One of the means that was adopted was not to pay them any of the lease money which belonged to them unless they came all the way from Mexico to Oklahoma to get their pay. They could not get it at any place on the border. That was established by evidence satisfactory, I think, to every member of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

In the very best of faith, as has been suggested by the chairman, after having investigated the matter of the character of the owners of this bank, or those who are in the corporation, that name was inserted. But inasmuch as the Commissioner seems to have raised the question, and as the only object of the committee was to see that the payments were made at some convenient place for the Indians, I suggest to strike out the words "the Border National Bank" and insert in lieu thereof "some bank in Eagle Pass, Tex., to be selected by the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. LODGE. That suits me perfectly well. I withdraw my amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts withdraws his point of order.

Mr. LODGE. No; not the point of order. I withdraw my amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that it should read "the First National Bank, or the Border National Bank, of Eagle Pass, Tex.," there being those two banks at Eagle Pass.

Mr. McCUMBER. Are there only two banks there?

Mr. TELLER. Is that satisfactory?

Mr. McCUMBER. I understood that there were other banks there.

Mr. LODGE. There are only two—the Border and the First National.

Mr. McCUMBER. That would be entirely satisfactory.

Mr. TELLER. Are both national banks?

Mr. LODGE. Both are national banks; the First National Bank is the oldest and largest.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be done through either the First National Bank or the Border National Bank.

The SECRETARY. Amend the amendment on page 104, line 2. Before the word "Border" insert the words "First National Bank or the."

Mr. TELLER. Now, if that is satisfactory to the Senator who has this bill in charge—I do not refer to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. CLAPP. I have no objection.

Mr. LODGE. I have not this bill in charge.

Mr. TELLER. I know that.

Mr. LODGE. But the Senator from Colorado seems to think that I am not entitled to discuss this bill.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no.

Mr. LODGE. I am entitled to discuss this bill or any other bill.

Mr. TELLER. I thought you might think I was referring to you. I said I was referring to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

Mr. CLAPP. Inasmuch as the evidence before the Senate would seem to indicate that perhaps the First National Bank is the better of the two there is no objection to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. TELLER. I do not object to it.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. There is an amendment or two that I desire to make here.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts insist upon his point of order?

Mr. LODGE. No; I do not make the point of order, Mr. President.

Mr. TELLER. I understood the Senator to say that he was satisfied with that change.

Mr. LODGE. I am satisfied with that change and that clause. There should be a change in the next clause. I want to suggest a change there.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado propose an amendment to the amendment before the Senate? The question is on the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 104, after line 7, to insert:

All restrictions as to sale and incumbrance of all lands, inherited and otherwise, of all adult Kickapoo Indians, and of all Shawnee, Delaware, Caddo, and Wichita Indians affiliating with said Kickapoo Indians nonresident in the United States, who have been allotted land in Oklahoma are hereby removed: Provided, That any such Indian allottee in Oklahoma who is a nonresident of the United States may lease his allotment without restriction for a period not exceeding five years: Provided further, That the parent or the person next of kin having the care and custody of a minor allottee may lease the allotment of said minor as herein provided, except that no such lease shall extend beyond the minority of said allottee.

Mr. TELLER. On page 104, line 11, after the words "Kickapoo Indians" and before the word "nonresidents," I move to insert "now or hereafter."

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] has a very short amendment, and we may have some discussion on the pending amendment. I ask that it may be acted on now.

Mr. MONEY. I send up an amendment that I ask to have adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is it an amendment to the amendment just under consideration?

Mr. MONEY. It is an amendment to a paragraph already passed.

Mr. CLAPP. It is an amendment on page 41.

The SECRETARY. On page 41 it is proposed to amend, in line 14, by inserting, after the words "Nancy Bigknife," the words "Alice Owen and her children."

Mr. CLAPP. There is no objection to that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment of the committee will be regarded as open to amendment, and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi agreed to. The amendment as amended is agreed to without objection.

Mr. TELLER. On line 11, page 104, after the word "Indians," I move to insert the words "now or hereafter."

Mr. CLAPP. I have no objection to that amendment to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill why is it not just as well to strike out those provisos? The Department wants to get rid of these Indians, and all the Senators on the committee have said it is desirable to get rid of the Indians. Why is it well to hold them on by these leases? Why not leave it absolutely free and strike out those provisos?

Mr. CLAPP. I do not think the committee would have any objection to striking them out. I think they were put in there rather as a suggestion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts move to strike out the provisos?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I move to strike out the two provisos.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "removed," in line 13, page 104, strike out the colon and insert a period, and strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I shall have to object to that amendment to the amendment for reasons that appear plain to me. A number of these Indians are going over to Mexico. We do not always know exactly what influence is being brought to bear upon them in order to gain their consent to change their domicile. It is not always easy to ascertain whether or not an absence of a month or two months or six months or even a year amounts to a change of residence. No time is given, and it seems to me that it will be better to allow this restriction to remain until we become certain that the Indian has changed his residence. I greatly fear that the mere absence of an Indian will be taken as a basis for some designing person who wants his land to secure a deed. I hope the provisos will remain in the bill until we can give it further consideration.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I believe it would be better to leave it in anyway until the conference committee can deal with it and see whether we should take it out or not.

Mr. LODGE. Along the line which the Senator from North Dakota is speaking, there is no provision here for the issuance of patents in fee simple, and the point is made in a note I got from the Department.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. NELSON. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LODGE. Then they would fall into the hands of the very adventurers and speculators the Senator from North Dakota was speaking about, because they would be the only ones who would know the right Indian, and other people would feel that it would be impossible to get the right or proper title. The Commissioner says:

So, practically, only parties to the scheme would be able to procure a deed from the right Indian.

It seems to me something would be needed to protect them further.

Mr. McCUMBER. My position simply was that by putting in an amendment now we are hurrying matters and may be doing something we would wish we had not acted quite so hastily upon. It seems to me we ought to know certainly that the Indian is a nonresident, and if left in this condition for a year or two the Department may have evidence sufficient to justify it in holding that the party is a nonresident.

Mr. KEAN. Would it not be better to leave out the whole paragraph?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I think not.

Mr. CLAPP. In regard to this matter of patent, I have had it brought up here two or three times in this bill where we remove restrictions. There is no objection to it, nor is there any earthly use in it. These Indians have already a deed called the "trust deed." We convert that into a patent by removing the restriction, and it is purely surplusage to provide for an additional patent when we remove all the restrictions that are contained in the existing instrument. There is no objection to putting it in if anybody desires it.

Mr. LODGE. I withdraw the motion to strike out those provisos.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts withdraws his motion, and the question is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. TELLER. I move to insert after the word "Oklahoma," in line 12, the words "or Indian Territory." These people are mixed, some being in one place and others in another.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 104, line 12, after the word "Oklahoma," insert the words "or Indian Territory."

Mr. CLAPP. There is no objection to that amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 104, after line 20, to insert:

That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $215,239, the same being the difference between the 32½ cents per acre to the Kickapoo tribe of Indians and the amount obtained by the United States for said lands: Provided, That there shall first be a roll of said Kickapoo tribe of Indians, embracing all persons who are members of said tribe by blood and who may be living on the 1st day of May, 1906, whether residing in the United States or not, made under the supervision of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. And the said sum of money hereby appropriated shall then be immediately distributed per capita to the members of the said Kickapoo tribe so enrolled and be paid to the said members of said tribe, either through an agent appointed by said Commissioner, or, if so designated by him, the American consul whose office may be most accessible to the members of said tribe not residing in the United States. The shares of minors shall be paid to the parent or next of kin having the care and custody of said minor. And the receipt, the form of which to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, by such parent or custodian for such minors, and the receipt of such members of said tribe shall be deemed to be a receipt in full for all demands of every kind whatever of such persons against the United States, and shall be considered and deemed a final settlement of all claims of said Indians against the United States. And thereupon such Indians and their descendants who have permanently left or who may hereafter permanently remove from the United States shall thenceforth be no longer wards of the Government and shall not be recognized by any department thereof as being entitled to any benefits as Indians. Should any member of said tribe die between the said 1st day of May, 1906, and the time of payment, his such share shall be paid to the lawful heirs of such claimant upon satisfactory proof being made to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the amendment?

Mr. KEAN. I certainly object to agreeing to this amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is open to consideration.

Mr. KEAN. I make the point of order, in the first place, that it is general legislation. In the next place, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this is a claim that has been paid by the Government of the United States, as I am informed, about three times. I have here what the Commissioner says and what he recommends in his letter dated April 5, 1905, to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, in which he opposes the payment of the money over again.

Mr. GALLINGER. Read it.

Mr. KEAN. I will read it:

This paragraph has been before the office several times, former Commissioners Browning and Jones both reporting adversely on bills of this character on the ground that the Indians have been paid everything that they were entitled to receive and that they had no title to the lands for which it is now proposed to pay them the second time, and that this would be the third time the Government has paid for the land, as it bought said land in the first place from the Creeks for 30 cents an acre. Each Commissioner took the ground that it was not the proper thing to do; but if Congress sought to deal thus liberally with these particular Indians they did not feel called upon to interpose any very serious objection. In a letter to the chairman of the Senate committee, dated April 5, 1906, I took a similar position. It should be added that probably there are few Indian tribes whose lands have been opened to settlement that could not present a better claim for additional payment. I believe that one of the grounds upon which it is urged that equity demands that they be paid the second time is that they were deceived and a fraud was perpetrated in the preparation of the agreement. It would be interesting to know the effect such a precedent as this would have on a claim submitted by the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indians, because their agreement was changed without their consent by Congress. There are other similar cases.

I trust the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. Does the Senator make a point of order against the amendment?

Mr. KEAN. I make the point of order that it is general legislation.

Mr. CLAPP. I think perhaps in this case that point is well taken.

Mr. TELLER. The amendment may be amenable to a point of order. The chairman of the committee seems to think it is. The Government of the United States bought this land from these people, who had the title, and sold it. The Supreme Court of the United States declared in a similar case that the Government must respond as trustee to the Indians for the full amount it received for the land. Ordinary rules of law would always require the trustee to do that. The law does not allow the trustee to make any money out of the ward's property, and that is all there is in this claim.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. Is not this a case where the evidence showed that a man came up here with one Indian and negotiated a treaty and got $5,000 for negotiating it, and the money was paid him by the Government?

Mr. TELLER. That is exactly what did happen in this case. It was a most scandalous affair under any phase of it. Only one man came here who was really an Indian, and a man who was representing the Indians, and he was paid $5,000 for securing this treaty.

But independent of that, Mr. President, the Government of the United States was dealing with its wards. It took its title from its wards and then sold the land for a different sum from what it responded to these Indians. The Supreme Court of the United States, in a case some years ago, entitled, as I recollect, "The New York Indians," settled that question. I need not say to lawyers here that it is the rule that a trustee is never allowed to make any money out of the property of his ward. He is not allowed to deal with them in that way.

It was thought best to close up this entire affair. I do not know what the Senator from New Jersey reads from, whether it is something from the Interior Department or where.

Mr. KEAN. It is from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. TELLER. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs was before the committee, and I understood him to say that he thought it was a just and proper claim against the Government. He seems to have had one opinion at one time and another opinion at another time. I think if there was any way by which he could deprive these Indians of getting what belongs to them he would be pretty industrious in that direction.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I insist on the point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota withdraw the amendment?

Mr. CLAPP. Well, I am inclined to think the point of order is well taken.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, under the subhead of "Sacs and Foxes of the Mississippi (treaty)," on page 108, after line 4, to insert:

That the claim made by holders of Kaw or Kansas interest-bearing scrip certificates, filed in the Department of the Interior on or before the 1st day of March, 1890, that they be paid from the Treasury of the United States a balance found due upon computing interest at 6 per cent, as promised on the face of said certificates, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, to determine whether, in the opinion of said court, their claim should be allowed. The Government shall be represented by the Attorney-General.

The court shall inquire into the circumstances of the issuance of said scrip certificates, the sale of lands, the application of the proceeds thereof, and the several acts of Congress appropriating money to liquidate the amount due on said scrip certificates. The court may take into account the relation of the United States to said lands in the nature of a trustee, and determine, upon principles of fair and equitable dealing, whether any obligation may properly rest upon the United States to pay to the bona fide holder of said scrip certificates interest according to the terms of their original issue, and report its findings to Congress: Provided, That one or more holders of said scrip certificates, or his or their duly authorized attorney, shall file a petition in said court as a test case or cases within six months after the approval of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 109, after line 4, to insert:

That the boundary line between the Creek Nation, Indian Territory, and the Territory of Oklahoma, as surveyed by Frederick W. Bardwell in 1871, and reestablished by the Geological Survey in 1895 and 1896, is hereby declared to be the west boundary line of the Creek Nation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 109, after line 11, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be appraised, at their cash value, all lands lost by said surveys by the Creek Nation, and payment therefor shall be made by him to the nation. Upon the relinquishment to the Creek Nation, and to the United States, of the lands within the boundary of the nation, as herein provided, improperly patented to homestead claimants in Oklahoma, and the surrender of the patents, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to have issued new patents for the portions of the homesteads in Oklahoma, and to pay to such claimants, after appraisement, the cash value of the land relinquished. The sum of $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of the moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for carrying out the provisions hereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 110, after line 2, to insert:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to examine the accounts of William R. Little, formerly a trader at the Sac and Fox Agency, and to pay to the said William R. Little or his heirs such sums as he may be satisfied are equitably due from Indian members of the said Sac and Fox tribe to the extent of any funds in his hands or to come into his hands and control belonging respectively to such Indians.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 112, after line 20, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue patents in fee, severally, to No wa hi, Darwin Hayes, Red Plume and Shoe, Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians, for not to exceed 40 acres of the lands heretofore allotted to them, respectively, in the Territory of Oklahoma, and the issuance of said patents shall operate as the removal of all restrictions as to the sale, incumbrance, or taxation of said lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 113, after line 3, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue patents in fee, severally, to Massie Chandler and Nannie Chandler, Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indian allottees, numbered, respectively, 209 and 210, for the lands heretofore allotted to them in the Territory of Oklahoma, and the issuance of said patents shall operate as the removal of all restrictions as to the sale, incumbrance, or taxation of said lands.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator in charge of the bill if he has any objection to having inserted in line 5, after the word "authorized," the words "in his discretion?"

Mr. CLAPP. Personally I have no objection, but the object of these provisions is to give these men their titles without their going to the expense and delay of applying to the Department. As that is the policy which is being pursued, there is no use of putting that amendment in.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire move the amendment?

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 113, line 5, after the word "authorized," it is proposed to insert "in his discretion;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to issue patents, etc.

Mr. CLAPP. I will not object to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 113, line 16, after the word "them," to insert "Per mam su or Comanche Jack, Comanche allottee No. 2025, Mary McCoy, Sac and Fox allottee, Isaac McCoy, Ottawa allottee;" and in line 18, after the word "allottee," to strike out "Victoria Ezell (nee Bradley), Glen Bradley, Alexander B. Peltier, Lincoln Kennedy, John B. Bruno, Lucy A. Lourane, Zoe Rhodd, Nellie Finley, Eliza J. Neiswender, Davis Hardin, Daniel Chilson, Amanda Nadeau (nee Toupin), R. W. Dike, Doshia E. Phillips (nee Kennedy), Joseph Bertrand, Benjamin Bertrand, Dan. O'Brien, Philip Wickens, and William Frapp, Citizen Pottawatomie allottees No. 180, 182, 113, 1351, 121, 210, 104, 563, 17, 41, 702, 98, 738, 371, 140, 772, 774, 109, and 583, respectively; Albert M. Clardy, John B. Bergeron, Catherine (nee Bourbonnais) Peltier, and Anthony Bourbonnais, jr., Citizen Pottawatomie allottees in Oklahoma No. 1363, 37, and 34, respectively; Julia Lazelle and Phillip Wickens, Citizen Pottawatomie allottees No. 117 and 583, respectively; heir of Horace P. Jones, Kiowa allottee No. 2356;" so as to make the clause read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to issue fee-simple patents to the following parties for the lands heretofore allotted them: Per mam su or Comanche Jack, Comanche allottee No. 2025; Mary McCoy, Sac and Fox allottee; Isaac McCoy, Ottawa allottee; Minnie Plumb, Mississippi Sac allottee, and the issuance of said patents shall operate as a removal of all restrictions as to the sale, incumbrance, or taxation of the lands so patented.

Mr. CLAPP. At the request of the Department, I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment. On page 13, line 16, after the word "them," I move to insert: "Frank O. Jones, Sac and Fox allottee, No. 10."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator in charge of the bill if he has any objection to going back to page 112 and inserting, after the word "authorized," in line 22, the words "in his discretion?" I notice those words are in all the items which came from the other House relating to patents, and I think it is well enough for us to follow that form.

Mr. CLAPP. I will say, for the Senator's benefit, that I have no particular interest in the matter; but since this bill passed the other House another bill has passed that body, and is now pending here, to give that discretion. The amendment put on in the Senate was adopted with a view of allowing allottees——

Mr. GALLINGER. This simply makes the bill uniform, and I will move that amendment, if the Senator has no objection to it.

Mr. CLAPP. I have no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 112, line 22, after the word "authorized," it is proposed to amend the amendment heretofore made by inserting "in his discretion;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to issue patents in fee, severally, to No wa hi, Darwin Hayes, Red Plume and Shoe, Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians, for not to exceed 40 acres of the lands heretofore allotted to them, etc.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That amendment of the committee, which has heretofore been agreed to, will be considered as open to amendment, in the absence of objection. The question is on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. KEAN. I understand that on page 13, line 5, an amendment inserting those same words was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; that amendment was made.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 114, after line 20, to insert:

That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim for services rendered by Clement N. Vann and William P. Adair, late of the Indian Territory, to the said Osage Nation of Indians, in defeating a treaty between the said nation and the United States, executed in 1868, commonly known as the "Drum Creek treaty," and certain proposed legislation injurious to the Osage Indians for the sale of their lands in Kansas, and in procuring the enactment of other legislation favorable to said Indians for the sale of said lands.

That a petition may be filed by the executor or administrator of the estates of said Adair and Vann, respectively, in said courts within forty days from the approval of this act against the Osage Nation of Indians, and service of said petition shall be had by delivering a copy thereof to the Secretary of the Interior and to the governor or principal chief of said nation, with a notice to answer within the time herein prescribed; and said answer shall be filed in said court within ninety days after the service of the petition.

The court may receive and consider all papers, depositions, records, and documents heretofore filed either in said court or the Executive Departments of the Government, together with any other evidence offered by either party to the case, and shall render a judgment or decree against the Osage Nation of Indians for such amount, if any, as the court shall find legally or equitably due for the services of said Adair and Vann, either upon contract or upon a quantum meruit, provided said court shall determine that a plea of quantum meruit may be interposed and considered, not exceeding $180,000. The court shall enter judgment for the total amount found to be due, if any, and shall specify therein the amounts payable to any person or persons under any contract or assignment made since September 26, 1902, covering any portion of said claim. The amount necessary to pay said judgment is hereby appropriated out of the funds in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of said Osage Nation.

Said cause shall be advanced on the calendar of said court. The amount for which judgment may be rendered by the Court of Claims, when paid to the parties named in said judgment, shall be received in full and final settlement of the claim for said services of said Adair and Vann against said nation of Indians: Provided, That the Osage tribe be, and are hereby, authorized to employ counsel, with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior, to represent them in said cause.

Mr. KEAN. I will ask the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], who has examined this case very carefully, whether this is merely a proposition to refer this matter to the Court of Claims?

Mr. TELLER. That is all there is of it—referring it to the Court of Claims. The Indians have for several years past exerted their utmost endeavors to have this case disposed of, and this, I think, will effect a final disposition of it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, at the top of page 117, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Lorenzo A. Bailey $6,155.22, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States belonging to the Osage Nation or tribe of Indians, for his retainer fee and his contingent fee in the Watson Stewart case, under his contract with said nation bearing date February 29, 1904, and such further sum as the Court of Claims may hereafter determine to be a fair and reasonable fee to him under said contract.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 117, after line 10, to insert:

That the Indian appropriation act of March 3, 1901 (31 Stats., p. 1065), be amended so as to read as follows: "That it shall be unlawful hereafter for the traders upon the Osage Indian Reservation to give credit to any individual Indian, head of a family, to an amount greater than 75 per cent of the next quarterly annuity to which such Indian will be entitled."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Oregon," on page 118, after line 3, to insert:

Whereas James McLaughlin, an Indian inspector for and on behalf of the Secretary of the Interior, under and by virtue of an act of Congress approved July 1, 1898 (30 U. S. Stat. Laws, p. 571), entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes," did, on the 17th day of June, 1901, make and conclude an agreement with the Klamath and Modoc tribes and Yahooskin band of Snake Indians, residing on the Klamath Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon, which agreement is as follows:

This agreement, made and entered into on the 17th day of June, 1901, by and between James McLaughlin, United States Indian inspector, on the part of the United States, and the Klamath and Modoc tribes and Yahooskin band of Snake Indians, belonging to the Klamath Indian Agency, in the State of Oregon, witnesseth:

ARTICLE I. The said Klamath and other Indians belonging to the Klamath Agency, Oreg., for the consideration hereinafter named, do hereby cede, surrender, grant, and convey to the United States all their claim, right, title, and interest in and to all that part of the Klamath Indian Reservation lying between the boundaries described in the treaty with said Indians concluded October 14, 1864, and proclaimed February 17, 1870, as confirmed by the Klamath boundary commission in their report to the Secretary of the Interior, dated December 18, 1896, and the reservation boundary lines as established by the survey approved in 1888 by the General Land Office, the tract of land hereby ceded and relinquished comprising 621,824 acres.

ART. II. In consideration of the land ceded, relinquished, and conveyed by Article I of this agreement, and in full of all claims and demands of said Klamath and other Indians arising or growing out of the erroneous survey of the outboundaries of their reservation in 1871, the United States stipulates and agrees to pay to and expend for said Indians, in the manner hereinafter provided, the sum of $537,007.20, being at the rate of 86.36 cents per acre, the price awarded for said lands by the Klamath boundary commissioners in their report to the Secretary of the Interior, dated December 18, 1896.

ART. III. It is agreed that of the amount to be paid to the said Klamath and other Indians, as stipulated in Article II of this agreement, the sum of $25,000 shall be paid in cash pro rata, share and share alike, to each man, woman, and child belonging to said Klamath and other tribes and under the jurisdiction of the Klamath Indian Agency within one hundred and fifty days from and after the date of the ratification of this agreement, and the sum of $350,000 shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of said Indians, and shall draw interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, which interest shall be paid to said Indians annually per capita in cash, and that the remainder of said sum of $537,007.20, after the payment of the legal fees of attorneys having duly approved contracts, shall be expended for the benefit of said Indians, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, upon requisition of the Indians through the United States Indian agent, in the drainage and irrigation of their lands and the purchase of stock cattle for issue to said Indians, and for such other purposes as may, in his opinion, best promote their welfare: Provided, That beneficiaries whose allotments will not be benefited by the irrigation systems constructed under this provision shall not bear any of the expense of such irrigation construction, and shall, as nearly as practicable, receive an equivalent in value of the stock cattle or other articles herein contemplated, that each beneficiary may thus receive his or her proportionate share of the benefits of this provision: And provided further, That in addition to the interest on the fund deposited in the United States Treasury, the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, expend for the benefit of said Indians, including reasonable cash payments per capita, not to exceed 10 per cent per annum of the principal fund upon a majority of the male adult Indians of Klamath Agency petitioning for same through the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

ART. IV. It is understood that nothing in this agreement shall be construed to deprive the said Klamath and other Indians of the Klamath Agency of any benefits to which they are entitled under existing treaties not inconsistent with the provisions of this agreement.

ART. V. This agreement shall take effect and be in force when signed by United States Indian Inspector James McLaughlin and by a majority of the male adult Indians parties thereto, and when approved by the Secretary of the Interior and accepted and ratified by the Congress of the United States.

For the purpose of carrying into effect the foregoing agreement the sum of $537,007.20 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the said agreement is hereby ratified and confirmed. Of the said sum so appropriated, $350,000 shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of said Indians and the remainder shall be expended as provided in the third article of said agreement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to line 24, on page 119, where there is a typographical error in the amendment, the word "eighth-six" appearing in place of "eighty-six."

Mr. CLAPP. That should be corrected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That correction will be made. The question is on the adoption of the amendment as thus amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. FULTON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be inserted after the word "agreement," in line 9, on page 122.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "agreement," following line 9, on page 122, it is proposed to insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to exchange the whole of the odd-numbered sections and parts thereof in the Klamath Indian Reservation in the State of Oregon, now held in private ownership under the final decree and decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, affirming the title of the California and Oregon Land Company thereto, in the suit of the United States against said company as reported in volume 192, at page 353, of the decisions of said court, and aggregating 111,385 acres, for other lands not exceeding 87,000 acres, situate in one or more compact bodies, in townships 31 and 32 south, of ranges 11, 12, and 13 east in said reservation, said lands so taken in exchange to be selected, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior; and in order to facilitate such exchange and the development of the lands to be so taken thereunder there may also be selected in like manner and as part of the quantity aforesaid other lands in said reservation for the location, construction, and operation of mills and power plants, and with the right to construct railroads, dams, reservoirs, and power-transmission lines, subject to the provisions of existing law and such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe thereunder. And when such exchange is effected patents for the lands so selected and approved shall issue therefor.

Mr. CLAPP. There is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, under the subhead "Models (treaty)," on page 123, after line 8, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to investigate the following claims against the United States, namely, the claims, respectively, of the Waukikum bands of the Chinook Indians of the State of Washington, of the Nuc que clah we muck band of the Chinook Indians of the State of Oregon, of the Chehalis tribe of Indians of the State of Washington, and of the Wheelappa band of the Chinook Indians of the State of Washington; and to report said investigation, with a recommendation, to the second session of the present Congress; and the said Secretary is authorized and directed to ascertain, if he can, what said claims can be settled for, and to report the same with his recommendations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 123, after line 21, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and required, subject to such regulations as he may prescribe, to permit owners of sheep to cross the Umatilla Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon, with their flocks in going to and returning from summer ranges.

Mr. CLAPP. After the word "sheep," in line 24, page 123, I move to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting the words "and cattle."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 123, line 24, after the word "sheep," it is proposed to insert "and cattle;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and required, subject to such regulations as he may prescribe, to permit owners of sheep and cattle to cross the Umatilla Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon, with their flocks in going to and returning from summer ranges.

Mr. GALLINGER. In reference to that amendment, as I understand the matter, the Indian Office is now negotiating for the purpose of trying to have an agreement satisfactory to all parties made in regard to this matter. This amendment requires him to close it out. Why should he make regulations to allow this thing to be done? Is the Senator in charge of the bill certain that that is a wise thing to do, under the circumstances?

Mr. CLAPP. The chairman of the committee thought it was in reporting the measure. It is an amendment that came from the State of Oregon, I think, and was brought to the attention of the committee by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON]. I see no reason why the Secretary of the Interior should not be required to make provision, so that men can get their flocks over this reservation.

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator will permit me, the occasion for this amendment grows out of conditions that exist in the State of Oregon, in the vicinity of the Umatilla Indian Reservation. There are something over 100,000 head of stock which must go across this reservation in order to get to their summer feeding grounds, or they must go around the reservation. They can cross it by traveling about 15 miles, whereas to go around the reservation would require a journey of nearly 100 miles.

The amendment simply requires that some provision shall be made allowing the crossing of this reservation, subject to regulations made by the Secretary of the Interior. It is true that negotiations are on foot between the Department of the Interior and these Indians looking to an adjustment of the matter, and I have no doubt they will be consummated; but I think the authority should be given; indeed, I think the Secretary of the Interior should be required to authorize this crossing. Even if the Indians become unreasonable and refuse an agreement, he should be required to do so, it seems to me. If the Senator knew the situation that exists there I am sure he would not object.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think likely, Mr. President, that there is a necessity for this, but the memorandum before me says that the Indians object to it because the stockmen break down their fences and destroy their crops when the animals are passing over this reservation. If that be so, of course it is a valid objection on the part of the Indians. To require the Secretary of the Interior arbitrarily to do this thing, whether the Indians object or not, it seems to me is going farther than we ought to go in that direction. I will suggest that I think this ought to be left in the discretion of the Secretary, and not make it an arbitrary regulation.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will listen for a moment, I think the Department misapprehends the use of the word "required" here. There is no occasion for being sensitive about that, because that does not apply so much as to the requirement of the Secretary as to giving him absolute authority if the Indians should not agree to it. It is safeguarded by providing that he may make all the rules and regulations that may occur to him in regard to security, the payment of damages, or anything else. Without the requirement, it is doubtful whether the Secretary could force a right of way over this reservation. That was the object of the use of the word.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Minnesota, Mr. President, if he is sure that the provision giving the Secretary the power to make regulations would cover the matter of damages? If it does, I certainly have no objection; but I had an impression that it might not go so far as that.

Mr. CLAPP. That would depend upon the regulations to be prescribed. The provision reads, "subject to such regulations as he may prescribe."

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator thinks he would prescribe?

Mr. CLAPP. I think so clearly. If he does not, I would want to protect them.

Mr. GALLINGER. If it goes to that extent, I certainly shall not object to it. I think the rights of the Indians ought to be safeguarded. We can readily understand that if flocks of sheep and droves of cattle are permitted to cross the reservation where the Indians have fences and where they have crops, considerable damage might be done.

Mr. FULTON. That is very true; but I will say, if the Senator will permit me, that the stockmen have offered to pay Indian police to go along and guard against the stock getting within the inclosures of the Indians or away from the road. What the Indians are doing is endeavoring to take advantage of the situation and insist on an exorbitant price, notwithstanding these Indian police go along.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think upon that statement the matter ought to remain as it is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota.

The SECRETARY. In line 24, page 123, after the word "sheep," insert the words "and cattle."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 125, after line 12, to insert:

For the improvement of the Indian school at Crow Creek Agency, S. Dak., by the erection of necessary buildings, and for repairs and improvements, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Chamberlain School," on page 126, line 1, after the word "dollars," to insert "to be immediately available;" so as to make the clause read:

For general repairs and improvements, for fire house and equipment, for two reservoirs or water tanks, and for changing sewer, $12,000, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Flandreau School," on page 126, line 13, before the word "thousand," to strike out "six" and insert "and for industrial and domestic school building, seventeen;" so as to make the clause read:

For general repairs and improvements, and for cement veneer for old buildings, and for industrial and domestic school building, $17,000; $2,500 to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 126, line 15, after the word "silo," to insert "and equipment thereof;" so as to make the clause read:

New silo, and equipment thereof, $2,000, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 126, line 17, to increase the total appropriation for the maintenance of the Flandreau School, South Dakota, from $72,425 to $83,425.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 127, after line 15, to insert:

For the purchase of 1,000 acres of land and springs and water right for a permanent water supply for the Indian school at Rapid City, S. Dak., $8,650.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 127, line 20, to increase the total appropriation for maintenance of the Rapid City School, South Dakota, from $48,350 to $57,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Sioux, Yankton tribe (treaty)," at the top of page 130 to insert:

For laundry, $6,000, to be immediately available; for water system, $3,500, to be immediately available.
In all, $34,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 130, after line 4, to insert:

That the sum of $5,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to put down an artesian well or wells at or near Lake Andes, on the Yankton Indian Reservation, S. Dak., at such place or places as he may determine, for the purpose of supplying said Indians with water for domestic purposes, for stock, and for irrigation purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 130, line 16, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two thousand five" and insert "three thousand two;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert "$3,200, and for the completion of the survey of said reservation, $1,000. In all, $4,200;" so as to make the clause read:

For clerical work and stationery in the office of the United States surveyor-general required on surveys within the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, S. Dak., the sum of $3,200, and for the completion of the survey of said reservation, $1,000. In all, $4,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 130, after line 18, to insert:

That jurisdiction be, and hereby is, conferred upon the Court of Claims in Congressional case No. 22524, on file in said court, entitled "The Sisseton and Wahpeton bands of Sioux Indians against the United States," to further receive testimony, hear, determine, and render final judgment in said cause, for any balance found due said bands, with right of appeal as in other cases, for any annuities which would be due to said bands of Indians under the treaty of July 23, 1851 (10 Stat. L., p. 949), as if the act of forfeiture of the annuities of said bands, approved February 16, 1863, had not been passed; and to ascertain and set off against any amount found to be due to said Indians all payments or other provisions of every name or nature made to or for said bands by the United States, or to or for any members thereof, since said act of forfeiture was passed, which are properly chargeable against said unpaid annuities.

Upon the rendition of such judgment and in conformity therewith the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to determine which of said Indians now living took part in said outbreak and to prepare a roll of the persons entitled to share in said judgment by placing on said roll the names of all living members of the said bands residing in the United States at the time of the passage of this act, excluding therefrom the names of those found to have participated in the outbreak; and he is directed to distribute the proceeds of such judgment, except as hereinafter provided, per capita to the persons borne on the said roll; and the court shall consider the evidence now on file in said cause in connection with such other evidence as may hereafter be adduced therein, and the said cause shall be advanced on the docket of the Court of Claims and of the Supreme Court of the United States if the same shall be appealed; and the court shall fix and determine, after full hearing, the amount that shall be deemed reasonable and just to be paid to the attorneys for said Indians for services rendered or to be rendered in said cause, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to pay the said sum of money to the said attorneys immediately upon the rendition of final judgment, out of the proceeds of said judgment and when an appropriation for the payment thereof is made by Congress; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to apply, and there is hereby appropriated, out of any funds standing to the credit of said Indians, the sum of $1,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the attorneys for said Indians now conducting said cause for the taking of testimony therein and for defraying the expenses of printing incidental thereto.

Mr. KEAN. I make the point of order that the amendment is general legislation. It has formerly been held to be general legislation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have not closely examined the amendment with reference to the point of order. The fact that it is intended to restore the payment of annuities that have been declared forfeited, it seems to me, would make it one peculiarly proper on the pending bill.

In explanation of the amendment I will simply call attention to the fact that in 1851, I think it was, a treaty was made with the Wahpeton and Sisseton band of Sioux Indians, and this treaty was afterwards modified to some extent by a new treaty in 1868. This treaty ceded to the United States a large tract of land in the State of Minnesota. The Government was to pay for that cession of land certain annuities running over forty years, I think, although I am not certain as to the number of years. But twelve of those payments were made prior to 1862.

In the spring of 1862 occurred the Sioux outbreak, or what is known as the Minnesota massacre, of that year, in which certain of these bands of Sioux, notably those in the western and southern parts of Minnesota, took a conspicuous part; and it is undoubtedly true also that a large number of the Wahpeton and Sisseton bands were engaged in that insurrection.

I simply desire to call attention to one part of the agreement. There was a provision in one of the treaties—I do not remember which one it was; it makes no difference, because they were both for the payment of some lands—to the effect that those Indians should remain at peace with the people of the United States, and it contained a provision, not to be found in every treaty, to the effect that, in case of any disobedience of the laws by the Indians or any injury done to persons or property of the people of the United States by the Indians, the damages should be charged against the annuities of the Indians. So you see there was provision absolutely made for the payment of injuries or damages resulting from any character of depredation.

Mr. President, this was the condition at the time of the outbreak in 1862. There were a great many people murdered during this episode. It lasted somewhere in the neighborhood of about one month; possibly a little over. The first Congress thereafter, I think, forfeited all of the balance of the annuities. They forfeited it upon the only ground it would seem to me upon which it could be forfeited, that a war had really existed, and that they were treating not with wards of the Government, but treating with an independent nation. They had no authority, in my opinion, under the treaty that was made with these Indians, to forfeit those annuities, because provision was made to take from the annuities any sum of money that was found to be necessary to offset any depredations committed by the Indians. The Wahpeton and Sisseton tribes furnished very few members to that insurrection. In a number of other cases where a forfeiture has been made, the Government has since paid the sum of money to the Indians, after deducting any sum the Government has been compelled to pay to those injured by such depredations.

This amendment provides that the annuities shall be reinstated, practically; that the Court of Claims shall determine the extent of the injury to any property by reason of this uprising, and offset it against any claims for annuities. Upon the face of it the amendment seems to me to be fairly just and proper. The great majority of the tribe were not implicated in this massacre, but on the other hand furnished scouts and a great many of their young men to assist in quelling the disturbance. Justice has been meted out to every one of the Indians who engaged in that uprising. Some thirty-odd were hanged in New Ulm, I believe, during the same year. A number of them escaped and went to Canada and never returned to the United States. Others have been punished by long imprisonment. I doubt if there is a single man now living in that reservation who was in any way directly or indirectly implicated in or who took part in that general massacre. But in order to guard against the possibility of giving any reward to those who were engaged in that serious outbreak, the provision of the amendment is that the Secretary of the Interior shall determine whether or not any of those living there now were so engaged, and if so, they shall not be considered in the payment of these annuities.

I merely give this brief statement of the matter so that Senators may understand it, and especially the Senator who raised the point of order. In my opinion this money is justly due to those Indians. We have declared it forfeited. If this sum is due, it is a sum made due by treaty, and certainly, where the treaty itself provides for the payment of a sum of money, we have a right to appropriate the necessary amount to pay it. It is not new legislation; it is not general legislation, because the treaties are still extant under which the payment is to be made.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from North Dakota to the finding of the Court of Claims in this case. This is part of the second finding:

> That the proportion of such members, if there were any, who were not so concerned in the said depredations, or some of them, does not appear, and it is impossible from the evidence to find such proportion. If such proportion could be pointed out, there could be no proper distribution of the annuities to loyal members, for the reason that the individual members who were loyal, or who were not so concerned in said depredations, and who would be entitled to such distribution, do not appear, as stated in finding I.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is reading from the findings of the Court of Claims, under a bill that differed very materially from this amendment, because that bill required the Court of Claims not only to find out who were implicated, and it seemed impossible for them to ascertain, but also who were the children of those who were implicated, because the old bill denied any payment even to the heirs of those who were engaged in the insurrection.

Mr. KEAN. That is the case in which the court did make the findings.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is made upon the same subject-matter, but upon an entirely different bill. This amendment simply allows the Department to go ahead and pay out the annuities, and to pay them to the tribe generally without reference to the old act of forfeiture which was passed by Congress in 1862, I think.

Mr. KEAN and Mr. GALLINGER. 1863.

Mr. McCUMBER. 1863; the Senator from New Hampshire corrects me. The amendment certainly, it seems to me, is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from North Dakota is familiar with this case, and I should like to ask him what bands engaged in this insurrection?

Mr. McCUMBER. There were what were known as the "Upper Santee" and "Lower Santee" bands, and another band or party in western Minnesota, the name of which I do not remember. It is possible the Senator from Minnesota remembers the name better than I can.

Mr. CLAPP. The Medawakantons.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Medawakantons.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from North Dakota says the former bill on which the finding of the Court of Claims was made denied compensation to the heirs of those engaged in this massacre.

Mr. McCUMBER. The descendants. Yes; that is my understanding.

Mr. GALLINGER. The descendants. Does not the Senator think if this amendment is not guarded in that respect it ought to be? Does the Senator think the heirs ought to be compensated?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do, for this reason: This was not a general uprising so far as concerns these two bands—the Wahpetons and Sissetons. There were a few of their members, there may have been one or two or three hundred who engaged in it, and they engaged in it against the will and the advice and despite the attempt of the older men of those two bands to keep them out of it. It was a year of great excitement. The Indians have been deprived of their annuities. They had been defrauded and cheated until they raised against the white people, and following this a great many of the younger men of those two bands, as I stated before, took part in it. They have been punished. Probably not half a dozen of those who took part in it are alive to-day, and in a case of murder or theft or anything of that kind it is not our policy to punish the children for the crime of the father.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator thinks that most of them have been apprehended——

Mr. McCUMBER. I think practically all.

Mr. GALLINGER. And either executed or imprisoned?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think so. There are some who are living there, and the officers can ascertain who they are, because they have a record of their imprisonment. Every one against whom there was any evidence of having taken part in the insurrection was either executed or hanged, and the others served long terms of imprisonment.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I have been examining the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs containing the hearings on this question. Part of the reservation occupied by these Indians lies in the State of North Dakota. It is a very small part of it, however. The larger part of it lies in South Dakota. On reading this report I find that Mr. D. N. Cooley, who was Commissioner of Indian Affairs in 1866, has this to say in regard to the character of these Indians:

> In this speedy suppression of the outbreak many friendly Indians acted as scouts, and otherwise rendered good service. They never committed any acts of hostility. * * * They have remained friendly while compelled to a vagabond life for three years by the indiscriminate confiscation of all the land and property of their people.

Further along in his report on this case he says:

> In 1867 the Government, having been convinced that a great wrong had been done in the case of the Sisseton and Wahpeton bands, who not only refrained from hostilities, but had periled their lives in defense of the whites and in delivering a large number of captive women and children who had been captured by the hostiles, appointed a commission to treat with these bands. This treaty, concluded February 19, 1867, in its preamble recites the fact that the act of February 16, 1863, had wronged these bands, and the third article, "for and in consideration of the faithful services said to have been rendered by them," and "in consideration of their confiscated annuities, reservation, and improvements," set apart for the scouts and their families the Traverse Lake reservations and the fourth article for the others, who fled from the hostiles to the north, the reservation of Devils Lake.

So these Indians have been recognized as friendly Indians, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs—in fact, Congress itself—has drawn a very distinct line between those who were hostile to the Government and those who were friendly.

I observe in this same report a quotation from the speech made here in 1899 by Senator Cushman K. Davis, who had given extensive consideration to this question; and I think it will be generally conceded that Senator Davis knew thoroughly what he was talking about. I shall quote briefly from the speech made by the late Senator from Minnesota. He said:

> One of these bands went to war with the United States, and a scene of great devastation and slaughter was exhibited in my own State. * * * Now, the fact was (and nothing is better known in the history of my own State, where the tragedy occurred), that three of these bands took no part in the massacre. It was perpetrated entirely by the Santees, and as public opinion and knowledge have become better acquainted with the subject, the conscience of those States, and my own State especially, has been aroused to the conviction that reparation shall be made and justice be done.

Mr. President, so much in regard to the question whether these Indians are entitled to the restoration of their annuities. I think it is the only case in the history of the United States where annuities have been taken away from Indians for hostile acts and never have been restored.

On the question of the point of order, I do not think the point of order is well taken. While it is true there is a provision in the amendment for an appropriation of a small sum of money, yet the purpose of the amendment is to submit the question to the Court of Claims. We do not undertake here to decide the case. We leave it to the Court of Claims to ascertain the facts and to report upon the facts so ascertained. If the point of order will lie against an amendment of this kind, there would not be much left of any of the appropriation bills that go through this body. I do not myself think the point of order is well taken.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will leave the question to the Senate under Rule XX. Is the amendment in order?

Mr. KEAN. I think it had better not be submitted to-night. Will the Senator from Minnesota say that he can get along with a compromise by striking out of the amendment the clause beginning at line 12, down to and including line 19—that is, after the word "Congress," in line 12, to the end of the paragraph?

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask the Senator what would be the object in striking it out?

Mr. CLAPP. That would strike out the appropriation of $1,500.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to striking out the clause.

Mr. CLAPP. There is no objection to striking it out.

Mr. KEAN. I move to strike out those lines.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey proposes an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "Congress," in line 12, page 132, strike out the following words:

And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to apply, and there is hereby appropriated, out of any funds standing to the credit of said Indians, the sum of $1,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the attorneys for said Indians now conducting said cause for the taking of testimony therein and for defraying the expenses of printing incidental thereto.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEAN. Now, I will withdraw my point of order so as not to embarrass the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey withdraws the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 133, after line 3, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to allow Bertha D. Staley, administratrix of the estate of James Staley, deceased, credit in the sum of $475.63 in the settlement of the accounts of said James Staley, deceased, late superintendent Indian training school, Yankton Agency, S. Dak., and special disbursing agent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 133, line 16, before the word "rules," to insert "such;" so as to make the clause read:

That Yuhunhunzewin, Sisseton and Wahpeton allottee No. 863, to whom a trust patent has been issued containing restrictions upon alienation, may sell and convey any part of her allotment, but such conveyance shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and when so approved shall convey full title to the purchaser the same as if a final patent without restriction had been issued to the allottee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to offer an amendment to come in after line 19, page 133.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 19, page 133, insert:

That for the purpose of allowing any Indian allottee to sell for town-site purposes any portion of the lands allotted to him the Secretary of the Interior may, by order, remove restrictions upon the alienation of such lands and issue fee-simple patents therefor under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

Mr. CLAPP. There is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 133, after line 19, to strike out:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to cancel the patents for the allotments made to Thomas Bull, Sarah Bull, and Lillie Bull, Yankton Sioux allottees Nos. 1136, 1137, and 1138, respectively, and to reallot the lands covered by said patents to members of the Yankton Sioux tribe who were entitled to allotment but failed to receive lands when the Indians of said tribe were allotted lands in severalty.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 134, after line 3, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate the allotments made to It ko ki po pi or Joshua, John Joshua, Thomas Bull, Sarah Bull, and Lillie Bull, Yankton Sioux allottees Nos. 1139, 1140, 1136, 1137, and 1138, respectively; and if he becomes satisfied that there did not in fact exist said allottees or any of them at the time the said allotments were made, he is hereby authorized and directed to reallot the lands embraced in said allotments.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether it is intended to allow those allotments to any Indians except the Yankton Sioux?

Mr. CLAPP. I presume not. I think this was a suggestion sent in by the Department.

Mr. LODGE. Has the Senator any objection to adding, at the end of the paragraph, in line 14:

To the members of the Yankton tribe who were entitled to allotments, but failed to receive lands when the Indians of said tribe were allotted lands in severalty.

Mr. CLAPP. I have no objection at all to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 134, after line 14, to insert:

That the restrictions contained in terms, or by provisions of law then in force, upon the patent issued on the 10th day of June, 1889, to Angelique Dupuis, on the following-described property, to wit, the south half of the southeast quarter of section 17 and the north half of the northeast quarter of section 20, township 124 north, of range 50 west, principal meridian, in the Territory (now the State) of South Dakota, be, and the same are hereby, removed; and the heirs of the said Angelique Dupuis are hereby vested with title in fee simple in and to said land, and authorized to sell and convey the same, subject to the laws of the State of South Dakota relating to the estates of decedents.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 135, after line 2, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to issue fee-simple patents to the following parties for the lands heretofore allotted to them: Collins La Monte, allottee No. 837; Mrs. Artie Barber, allottee No. 574; Mrs. Mary S. Rouse, Ellen Young, Julia D. Picotte, and Joseph Leonard Smith, Yankton Sioux allottees Nos. 597, 1103, 897, 249 (and 488), respectively; Charles Henry Bonnin, Mercy Conger Bonnin, Joseph Shunk Laroche, Julia Shunk Laroche, Hermine Shunk, Alexander Shunk, William Shunk, Yankton Sioux allottees, and Jennie Quinn, a Sisseton and Wahpeton allottee, and the issuance of said patents shall operate as a removal of all restrictions as to the sale, encumbrance, or taxation of the lands so patented.

Mr. KEAN. I have no objection to the amendment, but I wish to ask the Senator from Minnesota a question.

A good many of these allottees have the numbers and a good many have not. Is not that rather likely to cause confusion?

Mr. CLAPP. I think not. It is just a matter as to whether those who sent them in indicated numbers or not. Some reported them one way and some the other.

Mr. KEAN. Some have numbers and some have not; that is all.

Mr. CLAPP. If it is thought necessary in conference we can put in the numbers in all cases. I do not think it would be material, however.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to offer an amendment. At page 113, line 12, after the word "lands," I move to insert:

That all restrictions as to sale and incumbrance as to the lands heretofore allotted in Oklahoma to Frank Shintcis and Jane Barone, absentee Shawnee allottees Nos. 29 and 30, are hereby removed.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to the amendment, but we are proceeding under a unanimous-consent agreement which takes the committee amendments first. I am not going to object to this amendment, but I merely mention it because, of course, amendments not offered by the committee are not now in order unless by unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts is correct in that statement. Without objection, the question will be put on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 135, after line 19, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to issue fee-simple patents to the following parties for the lands heretofore allotted to them: Daniel Dowan, Annie E. White, William B. Robertson, Henry Red Earth, Samuel Quinn, Jennie M. Bailly, Sarah La Batte, John La Batte, Mason S. La Batte, Mary Wynde, Viola Moore, formerly Viola Faribault, and Arthur Gray Cloud, Sisseton and Wahpeton allottees, and the issuance of said patents shall operate as a removal of all restrictions as to the sale, incumbrance, or taxation of the lands so patented.

Mr. CLAPP. At this point I desire to offer an amendment sent in from the Department.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 136, line 1, after the words "Viola Faribault," insert "Joseph R. Brown, jr., Amanda Brown."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 136, after line 4, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to issue fee-simple patents to Moses N. Vandel, heir of Charles E. Vandel, Arthur M. Vandel, James E. Vandel, Yankton Sioux Indians, deceased, for the land heretofore allotted them; and the issuance of said patents shall operate as a removal of all restrictions as to the sale, incumbrance, or taxation of the lands so patented.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota if it would not be better to say "to issue fee-simple patents to the heir or heirs," instead of undertaking to determine by law who is the heir, for that must be a question for the courts to decide, if there is any question.

Mr. CLAPP. There can be no objection at all to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Of course if he is the heir it will not affect his rights at all.

Mr. CLAPP. There is no question but that the heir is a well-known party, but there is no objection to it; it is better form.

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me it would be better form to put it that way; to strike out the words "Moses N. Vandel, heir" and insert "the heir or heirs."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 136, line 7, it is proposed to strike out the words "Moses N. Vandel, heir" and insert "the heir or heirs;" so as to read:

To issue fee-simple patents to the heir or heirs of Charles E. Vandel, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 136, after line 11, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to issue fee-simple patent to Wanyanka Mani, or Rev. Luke C. Walker, for the land heretofore allotted to him on the Sioux ceded tract, and the issuance of said patent shall operate as a removal of all restrictions as to the sale, encumbrance, or taxation of the lands so patented.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 136, after line 18, to insert:

That Johah Irmwhip, allottee No. 97; Amos Sitoka, allottee No. 1214; Sunrise, allottee No. 885; Josephine Brunot, allottee No. 615; John Wabcahunka, allottee No. 1025; Tunkasapa, or Joseph T. Cook, Anpaodutawin, or Mary Ann Langlois, Yankton Sioux allottees to whom trust patents have been issued containing restrictions on alienation, may sell and convey not exceeding 40 acres of their allotments; but such conveyance shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and when so approved shall convey full title to the purchaser the same as if a final patent without restriction had been issued to the allottee.

Mr. KEAN. I call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to the name of "Jonah Irmwhip," in line 19. The letter "o" should go in between the "r" and "m;" so as to read "Iromwhip."

Mr. CLAPP. I confess that I do not have the familiarity with the subject that the Senator from New Jersey probably has. I accept the amendment, if insisted on.

Mr. KEAN. I have been so informed. Let it read "Iromwhip."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 137, line 10, after the word "them," to strike out "Frances Ree, Victoria McBride, Peter Picotte, Louis Shunk, Frank La Rochelle, Louise Barbier Moran, Kate Marion Barbier, Peter La Grande, Lucy S. Patton, Joseph Dubray, Frederick Barbier, and Marie Barbier, Yankton Sioux allottees Nos. 228, 462, 162, 1038, 817, 1416, 1356, 776, 1007, 1040, 1354, 779, 242, and 780, respectively; Louise Cutschall, née Herman, Rosebud allottee No. 643; George W. Dripps, Yankton Sioux allottee No. 1435; Joseph Volin, Yankton allottee No. 1129; and the issuance of said patents shall operate as a removal of all restrictions as to the sale, incumbrance, or taxation of the lands so patented;" on page 138, line 5, after the word "patented," to insert "Louise Ange and Angel Ange Bagan, Sisseton and Wahpeton allottees;" and in line 7, after the word "allottees," to strike out "heirs of Louis Dechon, Alexis V. Renville, William M. Weatherstone, Daisy Rice, Mary S. Weatherstone, James Weatherstone, Ada Cloutier, Ralph Weatherstone, and Joseph La Fromboise, Sisseton and Wahpeton allottees Nos. 215, 1070, 1300, 1307, 1296, 1301, 212, and 724 (two numbers), 1299, and 1337;" so as to make the clause read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to issue fee-simple patents to the following parties for the lands heretofore allotted them: Louise Ange and Angel Ange Bagan, Sisseton and Wahpeton allottees, respectively; and the issuance of said patents shall operate as a removal of all restrictions as to the sale, incumbrance, or taxation of the lands so patented.

Mr. CLAPP. At this point I desire to offer an amendment at the request of the Department.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 138, line 6, before the name "Louise Ange," insert:

William Jandrin, Yankton allottee No. 1147.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 138, after line 18, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay the sum of $200 each to Pretty Bear, Chief Martin Charger, Swift Bird, Strike the Fire, Kills and Comes, Four Bear, Sitting Bear, Charging Dog, and One Rib, of Cheyenne River Reservation, in South Dakota, and Fast Walker, Mdoka, Red Dog, Black Eagle, Don't Know How, Black War Club, Fool Dog, and Walking Crane, of Crow Creek Reservation, in South Dakota, and Mad Bear, of Standing Rock Reservation, in South Dakota and North Dakota, all Sioux Indians, or their heirs, to reward them for services and sacrifice of ponies in accomplishing the rescue of Mrs. Julia Wright, Mrs. Emma Deely, and six children, all white persons, captives in the custody of the White Lodge bands of the Sioux Indians, in November, 1862, near the mouth of Grand River, Dakota Territory. That the sum of $3,600 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated therefor, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 139, after line 12, to insert:

That the tract of land within the old Cheyenne River Reservation, S. Dak., which was reserved from entry and settlement by proclamation of the President issued February 10, 1890, said tract being within that portion of the Great Sioux Reservation ceded by the agreement between the Sioux Nation and the United States, approved March 2, 1889 (25 Stat., p. 888), having, by the proclamations by the President issued February 7, 1903, and March 30, 1904, been declared subject to disposal under the provisions of said agreement, and which contains 33,676.33 acres, exclusive of one school section, is hereby accepted by the United States at the maximum price of $1.25 per acre, the same as fixed by section 21 of said act for the ceded lands disposed of within the first three years after the taking effect of the said act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 140, after line 6, to insert:

For the improvement of the Hope Indian School at Springfield, S. Dak., by the addition of another story to the rear portion of the main building, $3,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 140, after line 10, to insert:

For payment to fifteen Sioux Indians of Pine Ridge Agency, S. Dak., for property taken from them in the year 1876 by the United States military authorities for reasons of military expediency, while they were in amity with the Government, the names of the Indians and amounts to be paid to each having heretofore been found by the Department of the Interior and reported in estimates for appropriations required for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, and prior years, by the Indian Service, the sum of $6,320.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Utah," at the top of page 141, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to sell, at such price as he may deem fair and reasonable, 160 acres of land of the tract now occupied by the Shebit Indians in Washington County, Utah, to the Utah and Eastern Copper Company, including the 20 acres of land leased by the Secretary of the Interior to the said Utah and Eastern Copper Company on November 5, 1903, under the authority of the Indian appropriation act approved March 3, 1903; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make, execute, and deliver proper deeds of conveyance therefor and to expend the proceeds of the sale for the use and benefit of the Shebit Indians in such manner as he may deem best: Provided, however, That the consent of three-fourths of the adult male Indians to said sale is obtained: And provided, That said deed shall contain the following conditions or covenants, to wit: Prohibiting the sale or use of intoxicating liquor on any part of the land sold so long as the adjoining territory is used for an Indian reservation, and also prohibiting the pollution of the water after it leaves the smelters of the Utah and Eastern Copper Company, and also prohibiting the commission of nuisances of any kind whatsoever on the tract of land sold.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 142, after line 10, to insert:

IRRIGATION.

For constructing and completing irrigation systems to irrigate the allotted lands of the Uncompahgre, Uintah, and White River Utes in Utah, $600,000, $200,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, of which $125,000 shall be immediately available, the balance of said appropriation to be used as hereafter designated, to be reimbursed from the proceeds of the sale of the lands within the former Uintah Reservation: Provided, That such irrigation systems shall be constructed and completed and held and operated, and water therefor appropriated under the laws of the State of Utah, and the title thereto until otherwise provided by law shall be in the Secretary of the Interior in trust for the Indians, and he may sue and be sued in matters relating thereto: And provided further, That the ditches and canals of such irrigation systems may be used, extended, or enlarged for the purpose of conveying water by any person, association, or corporation under and upon compliance with the provisions of the laws of the State of Utah: And provided further, That when said irrigation systems are in successful operation the cost of operating same shall be equitably apportioned upon the lands irrigated, and when the Indians have become self-supporting to the annual charge shall be added an amount sufficient to pay back into the Treasury the cost of the work within thirty years, suitable deduction being made for the amounts received from disposal of the lands within the former Uintah Reservation.

Mr. GALLINGER. On page 143, line 11, after the word

"work," I move to amend the amendment by inserting the words "done in their behalf."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 143, line 11, after the word "work," it is proposed to amend the amendment by inserting "done in their behalf;" so as to read:

And provided further, That when said irrigation systems are in successful operation the cost of operating same shall be equitably apportioned upon the lands irrigated, and when the Indians have become self-supporting to the annual charge shall be added an amount sufficient to pay back into the Treasury the cost of the work done in their behalf within thirty years, suitable deduction being made for the amounts received from disposal of the lands within the former Uintah Reservation.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, under the subhead "Federated bands of Utes (treaty)," on page 144, after line 7, to insert:

That the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1903, be amended by adding after the words "Uintah County, Utah," in the thirty-fourth line of page 998 of part 1 of volume 32 of the United States Statutes at Large, the words "or in the office of the county recorder of Wasatch County, Utah, or with the recorder of the mining district in which such mining claims are situate," and by adding after the words "Uintah County," in the fortieth line of page 998 of part 1 of volume 32 of the United States Statutes at Large, the words "or Wasatch County."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 144, after line 23, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior may authorize the Indians of the former Uintah Reservation, in the State of Utah, to cut and sell cedar and pine timber for posts or fuel from the tracts reserved for grazing purposes for said Indians under joint resolution of June 19, 1902, in such quantities and upon such terms and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 145, after line 6, to insert:

For the purchase of lands and sheep for the San Juan Pah-Ute Indians, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 145, after line 8, to insert:

For the support and civilization of the Kaibab Indians in Utah, and for the purchase and acquiring of land and water, together with the necessary farming implements and machinery and live stock for their use, $10,500, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Washington," on page 146, after line 9, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, is hereby authorized to sell, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, any tract or tracts of land heretofore reserved for the Puyallup Indian School not now needed for school purposes, and to use the proceeds of said sale for the establishment of an industrial and manual training school for the Puyallup and allied tribes and bands of Indians at the site of the present Puyallup Indian School.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under subhead "Spokanes. (treaty)," on page 147, after line 11, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to sell and convey by patent, with such reservations as to flowage rights, dam sites, and mill sites appurtenant to water powers as he may prescribe, such tract or tracts of lands of the Spokane Indian Reservation, State of Washington, lying at or near the junction of the Columbia and Spokane rivers, not exceeding 360 acres in extent, for town-site and terminal purposes, upon the payment of such price as may be fixed by him, and that the money received therefrom shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Spokane Indians.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 147, after line 22, to insert:

COLVILLE RESERVATION.

To carry into effect the agreement bearing date May 9, 1891, entered into between the Indians residing on the Colville Reservation and commissioners appointed by the President of the United States under authority of the act of Congress approved August 19, 1890, to negotiate with the Colville and other bands of Indians on said Colville Reservation for the cession of such portion of said reservation as said Indians might be willing to dispose of, there shall be set aside and held in the Treasury of the United States for the use and benefit of said Indians, which shall at all times be subject to the appropriation of Congress and payment to said Indians, in full payment for 1,500,000 acres of land opened to settlement by the act of Congress "To provide for the opening of a part of the Colville Reservation, in the State of Washington, and for other purposes," approved July 1, 1892, the sum of $1,500,000, of which sum $150,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the benefit of said Indians.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 149, after line 3, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to issue fee-simple patents to the following parties for the lands heretofore allotted to them: George Bowen, Charles Finkbonner, Tee ah Ligh or George, Tang Weah or Louis, Tom Whaquiskun, Yah Him Aloo or Mary, Descanum or Albert, Kwina or Henry, Lummi allottees Nos. 1, 2, 3, 11, 16, 22, 28, and 30, respectively, on the schedule of allotments approved by the President October 14, 1884, and the issuance of said patents shall operate as a removal of all restrictions as to the sale, incumbrance, or taxation of the lands so patented.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 149, after line 15, to insert:

That Charles Sheestal, Swinomish allottee No. 23, to whom a patent has been issued in accordance with the provisions of the seventh article of the treaty of January 22, 1855, with the Dwamish and other Indians (12 Stat., p. 927), containing restrictions upon sale and alienation, may sell and convey the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 24, township 34 north, range 2 east, Willamette meridian, Washington, being 40 acres of his allotment, but that such conveyance shall be under the supervision and subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and when so approved shall convey full title to the purchaser; also the south half of the north half of the southeast quarter of section 23, township 34 north, range 2 east, Willamette meridian, or any part thereof, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior; and this conveyance, if any, shall be under the supervision and subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and when so approved shall convey full title to the purchaser.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 150, after line 10, to insert:

That Lizzie Peone, allottee No. 331 in what was formerly the north half of the Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, and to whom a trust patent has been issued containing restrictions upon alienation, may sell and convey any part of her allotment, but such conveyance shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and when so approved shall convey full title to the purchaser the same as if a final patent without restriction had been issued to the allottee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 150, line 23, after the word "them," to strike out "L. F. Laqua, a Yakima Indian, to his allotment, No. 780; Susan Stone (Swasey), a Yakima Indian, to her allotment, No. 286; Suis Sis Kin, or Loupe Loupe Charley, No. 4, Yakima, now Waterville, Wash.; Charles Wannassy, Yakima allottee No. 1618; Margaret Sar Sarp Kin, No. 6, Washington;" so as to make the clause read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to issue fee-simple patents to the following parties for the lands heretofore allotted them, and the issuance of said patents shall operate as a removal of all restrictions as to the sale, incumbrance, or taxation of the lands so patented.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask the Senate to disagree to that amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, on page 151, after line 8, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue a patent in fee simple to Franklin P. Olney, a Yakima Indian, for the land covered by his allotment No. 583; and the issuance of said patent shall operate as the removal of all restrictions as to sale, incumbrance, or taxation of the land so patented.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to amend the amendment just stated by striking out on page 151, line 10, after the word "authorized," the words "and directed" and inserting "in his discretion."

Mr. CLAPP. There is no objection to that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 151, line 10, after the word "authorized," in the amendment of the committee, it is proposed to strike out the words "and directed," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "in his discretion;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to issue a patent in fee simple to Franklin P. Olney, etc."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. While we are on these minor matters, on page 143, in line 11, in the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], I think there ought to be a comma inserted after the word "done," to make it read properly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes. I venture to suggest, in that same connection, that the amendment will read still better if at the close of line 8 a comma be inserted, and then if a comma be inserted after the word "self-supporting," in the next line; so as to read:

And, when the Indians have become self-supporting, to the annual charge shall be added, etc.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the amendment of the committee, which has heretofore been agreed to, will be regarded as open to amendment. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. I now offer the amendment which I suggested a moment ago in line 11, on page 143.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 143, line 11, after the word "done," it is proposed to insert a comma; so as to read:

And provided further, That when said irrigation systems are in successful operation the cost of operating same shall be equitably apportioned upon the lands irrigated, and, when the Indians have become self-supporting, to the annual charge shall be added an amount sufficient to pay back into the Treasury the cost of the work done, in their behalf within thirty years, suitable deduction being made for the amounts received from disposal of the lands within the former Uintah Reservation.

Mr. GALLINGER. There ought to be a comma inserted after the word "behalf," in line 11.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, that change will be made.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, under the subhead "Tomah School," on page 153, line 19, after the word "them," to strike out:

(Compson) Doxtater, William Cornelius, Ida Powless, Daniel H. Cooper, Charles Elm, Abram Elm, Catherine Nynham, Joshua Cornelius, Lehi Wheelock, Dennison Wheelock, Rachel Peters Jones, Jerusha Peters, and Alice Cornelius, Oneida allottees Nos. 137, 57, 224, 769, 1272, 1271, 1398, 1514, 373, 21, 310, 1137, and 62, respectively; Jacob Doxtater, allottee No. 1099; Rachel Elm, allottee No. 879; Jerusha Powless, allottee No. 1483; Hendrix Skenandooh, allottee No. 804; Hannah Hayes, allottee No. 305; Dolly Ann Doxtater, allottee No. 174; Martin Williams, allottee No. 420; Moses Webster, allottee No. 1135; Adam King, allottee No. 121; Elizabeth Nynham, allottee No. 1075; Elijah John, allottee No. 506; Silas Webster, allottee No. 1350; Henry Cooper, allottee No. 338; David King, allottee No. 201; Job Silas, allottee No. 333; Joseph Skenandooh, allottee No. 573; James Silas, allottee No. 2055; John Parkhurst, allottee No. 236, and David Adams, allottee No. 594, Oneida Indians; Isaiah Sycles, Schuyler Nynham, Archie Wheelock, Truman Doxtater, Sophia Webster, Mary Webster, Jane Parkhurst, Henry Wheelock, Eva Jourdan, William Archquette, Sarah Hill, Frank Button, Sylvester Button, Margaret Thomas, William Christjohn, Frank Cornelius, Alice Cornelius, Hannah Hill, Sarah Sycles, Adam P. Cornelius, Thomas John, Esther Christjohn, Joseph Metozen, and James Wheelock, Oneida allottees Nos. 677, 1399, 1061, 1079, 184, 1183, 1277, 344, 839, 720, 471, 376, 1268, 876, 1238, 717, 718, 148, 1486, 713, 733, 364, 142, and 16.

And on page 155, line 21, after the word "respectively," to insert "and Michel Buffalo, Red Cliff allottee No. 28;" so as to make the clause read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to issue fee-simple patents to the following parties for the lands heretofore allotted to them, respectively, and Michel Buffalo, Red Cliff allottee No. 28, and the issuance of said patents shall operate as a removal of all restrictions as to the sale, incumbrance, or taxation of the lands so patented.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 156, after line 6, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, with the consent of the Indians of the La Pointe or Bad River Reservation, to be obtained in such manner as he may direct, to set apart lots 10, 11, and 12, section 25, township 48 north, range 3 west, on the La Pointe Reservation, in Wisconsin, for an Indian town site, and to cause the lands described to be surveyed and platted into suitable lots, streets, and alleys, and to dedicate said streets and alleys and such lots or parcel as may be necessary to public uses, and to cause the lots to be appraised at their real value, exclusive of improvements thereon or adjacent thereto, by a board of three persons, one of whom shall be the United States Indian agent of the La Pointe Agency, one to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and one selected by the Indians of the La Pointe band of Chippewas, who shall receive such compensation as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of lots sold under this act, and when so surveyed, platted, and appraised, the President may issue patents to the Indians of the said reservation for such lots on the payment by them of the appraised value thereof, on such terms as may be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and the net proceeds of such sales shall be placed to the credit of the La Pointe band of Chippewa Indians: Provided, That no person shall be authorized to purchase lots on the lands described other than members of said La Pointe band of Indians, and those now owning permanent improvements there shall have the preference right for six months from the date such lots shall be offered for sale within which to purchase tracts upon which their improvements are situated, but no lot shall be sold for less than the appraised valuation; but if any person entitled fails to take advantage of this provision, the agent of the La Pointe Agency shall appraise the improvements on the unsold lots, and any member of the La Pointe band of Chippewas, on the payment to the owner of the appraised value of the improvements, shall have the preference right for six months from the date of such payment to purchase such unsold lot or lots at their appraised value on such terms as may be approved by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided further, That the patents to be issued shall contain a condition that no malt, spirituous, or vinous liquors shall be kept nor disposed of on the premises conveyed, and that any violation of this condition, either by the patentee or any person claiming rights under him, shall render the conveyance void and cause the premises to revert to the La Pointe band of Chippewa Indians, to be held as other tribal lands.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to amend the committee amendment, on page 156, line 8, after the word "authorized," by inserting the words "in his discretion."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 156, line 8, after the word "authorized," it is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting "in his discretion;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, with the consent of the Indians of the La Pointe or Bad River Reservation, to be obtained in such manner as he may direct, to set apart lots 10, 11, and 12, section 25, township 48 north, range 3 west, on the La Pointe Reservation, in Wisconsin, etc.

Mr. CLAPP. The committee amendment which the Senator proposes to amend was framed by the Department. I have no objection, however, to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is simply for the purpose of making it uniform with the other paragraphs.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. On page 157, line 23, manifestly the Department made a mistake in using the word "nor," where it should be "or." I move to strike out "nor" and insert "or."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 157, line 23, after the word "kept," it is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out "nor" and inserting "or."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 158, after line 3, to insert:

That the northeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 34, township 48 north, range 3 west, be set aside and dedicated as a burial ground, and for such other purposes as may be approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, for the use of the members of the La Pointe band of Indians. And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to sell and dispose of the merchantable timber growing thereon in such manner as he may deem best, for cash, and to expend the proceeds derived therefrom in paying the cost of surveying and platting the village of Odanah, in improving the cemetery site, and for public improvements in said village.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 158, after line 15, to insert:

STOCKBRIDGE AND MUNSEE TRIBE.

That the members of the Stockbridge and Munsee tribe of Indians, as the same appear upon the official roll of said tribe, made in conformity with the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1893, entitled "An act for the relief of the Stockbridge and Munsee tribe of Indians in the State of Wisconsin," and their descendants, who are living and in being on the 1st day of July, 1904, and who have not heretofore received patents for land in their own right, shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, be given allotments of land and patents therefor in fee simple, in quantities as follows:

To each head of a family, one-eighth of a section: Provided, That such allotment to the "head of a family" shall be deeemed to be a provision for both husband and wife, or the survivor in the event of the death of either.

To each single person not provided for as above, one-sixteenth of a section.

That where a patent has heretofore been issued to the head of a family (a married man) the same shall be deemed to have been in satisfaction of the claims of both husband and wife, and no further allotment shall be made to either of such persons under this act: Provided, That the children of such parents shall be entitled to allotments hereunder in their own right, if enrolled as members of the tribe.

That as there is not sufficient land within the limits of the Stockbridge and Munsee Reservation to make the allotments in the quantities above specified, all available land in said reservation shall first be allotted to the heads of families and single persons residing thereon, until said reservation land shall be exhausted, the additional land that may be required to complete the allotments to be obtained in the manner hereinafter specified: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary to carry out the requirements of this act as to making and designating allotments.

That it shall be obligatory upon any member of said tribe who has made a selection of land within the reservation, whether filed with the tribal authorities or otherwise, to accept such selection as an allotment, except that the same shall be allotted in quantity not to exceed that hereinbefore authorized: Provided, That where such selection does not equal in quantity the allotment hereinbefore authorized, the allottee may elect to take out of the lands obtained under the provisions of section 6 of this act the additional land needed to complete his or her quota of land, or in lieu thereof shall be entitled to receive the commuted value of said additional land in cash, at the rate of $2 per acre, out of the moneys hereinafter appropriated.

That those members of said tribe who have not made selections within the reservation shall be entitled to the option of either taking an allotment under the provisions of this act, or of having the same commuted in cash, at the rate of $2 per acre, out of the moneys hereinafter appropriated: Provided, That the election of any member to take cash in lieu of land shall be made within sixty days after the date of the approval of this act.

That for the purpose of obtaining the additional land necessary to complete the allotments herein provided for the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to negotiate, through an Indian inspector, with the Menominee tribe of Indians of Wisconsin for the cession and relinquishment to the United States of a portion of the surplus land of the Menominee Reservation in said State, or to negotiate with the authorities of said State, or with any corporation, firm, or individual, for the purchase of said additional land: Provided, however, That in no event shall any agreement of cession or contract of purchase so negotiated stipulate that a sum greater than $2 per acre shall be paid for the land so obtained: And provided further, That no such agreement or contract shall have any force or validity unless the same shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior; or said Secretary may, in his discretion, utilize such unappropriated public lands of the United States as may be required to complete the allotments.

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay to such members of the Stockbridge and Munsee tribe as he shall find entitled thereto under the said act of March 3, 1893, and the enrollment made thereunder, and the descendants who are living and in being on the 1st day of July, 1904, in cash per capita, the whole of the trust fund now to their credit in the Treasury of the United States when the allotment of lands to them shall have been completed as herein contemplated.

That certain members of the Stockbridge and Munsee tribe having made selections of land on tracts patented to the State of Wisconsin under the swamp-land acts, and having made valuable improvements thereon, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to cause said improvements to be appraised by an inspector or special agent or Indian agent of his Department, and to pay to the owners, as their interests may appear, the appraised value of said improvements, in all not to exceed the sum of $1,000, out of the moneys hereinafter appropriated.

That the sum of $35,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in commuting the value of allotments in cash, in payment for the cession or purchase of additional lands, and in compensating Indians for the appraised value of their improvements located on swamp lands, as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. CLAPP. On page 160, line 11, after the word "provisions," I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out the words "of section 6."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 160, line 11, after the word "provisions," it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by striking out the words "of section 6;" so as to read:

That it shall be obligatory upon any member of said tribe who has made a selection of land within the reservation, whether filed with the tribal authorities or otherwise, to accept such selection as an allotment, except that the same shall be allotted in quantity not to exceed that hereinbefore authorized: Provided, That where such selection does not equal in quantity the allotment hereinbefore authorized, the allottee may elect to take out of the lands obtained under the provisions of this act the additional land needed to complete his or her quota of land, or in lieu thereof shall be entitled to receive the commuted value of said additional land in cash, at the rate of $2 per acre, out of the moneys hereinafter appropriated.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have two or three notes on my desk relating to paragraphs which I think were considered when I was absent from the Chamber. Possibly the amendments I desire to suggest were made. On page 15, line 13, I will ask if the word "third" was changed to "second?"

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That change was not made.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am sure that that should read "approved March 2d," instead of "March 3d."

Mr. CLAPP. Is that in the Senate committee amendment?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is in the Senate committee amendment. It should be "March 2d;" and I move that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, line 13, before the word "eighteen," it is proposed to strike out "third" and insert "second;" so as to read:

That section 2 of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the acquiring of rights of way of railroad companies through Indian reservations, Indian lands, and Indian allotments, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1899, be, and the same hereby is, amended so as to read as follows, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. On page 7, I ask the Senator in charge of the bill if, in his judgment, it is not desirable to add, after the word "heirs," at the end of line 21, the words "who shall show to his satisfaction that they are competent to manage their own business affairs?"

Mr. CLAPP. I would object to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well, then, I will not offer the amendment.

There is one other matter. On page 30, in the Senate committee amendment, I ask the Senator if he thinks mineral lands should be included in that provision?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. What line?

Mr. GALLINGER. Lines 5 and 6.

Mr. DUBOIS. I think not. I intended to offer such an amendment as the Senator suggest, but I did not do so because I thought we could take it out in conference.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to strike out the words "or mineral lands," in lines 5 and 6; and before the words "timber lands," in line 5, to insert the word "or."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It seems to me that the words "or mineral lands," to meet the purpose of the Senator, should be retained. The words "mineral lands," in line 6, only refer to classification. The provision is that—

The residue or surplus lands * * * shall be classified under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior as agricultural lands, grazing lands, timber lands, or mineral lands.

The Senator will see that that refers simply to the classification.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator is right.

Mr. DUBOIS. That is right.

Mr. GALLINGER. Manifestly the Senator is right.

Mr. DUBOIS. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. In lines 11 and 12 mineral lands are excepted, as the Senator from Idaho intended.

Mr. DUBOIS. Yes; that is right.

Mr. GALLINGER. I had an impression it was just the reverse of that, as I read it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the first committee amendment which was passed over.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 17, in reference to the rate of interest, where it is proposed to strike out "three" and insert "four."

Mr. GALLINGER. I raised the question about that amendment, but I have no disposition to press it at all. I think that 4 per cent is named in the bill in one or two other places. I will ask the Senator from Minnesota if that is not true?

Mr. CLAPP. That is my understanding.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator in charge of the bill to refer to line 21, page 33. Has he any objection to this proviso:

And provided further, That any sums placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of said Indians shall bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, which interest shall be expended in the same manner as the principal.

Mr. CLAPP. None at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 33, line 21, after the word "otherwise," it is proposed to insert:

And provided further, That any sums placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of said Indians shall bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, which interest shall be expended in the same manner as the principal.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as open, and the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment is agreed to. The amendment as amended is agreed to.

Mr. DUBOIS. I desire to offer an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. LODGE. Is it a committee amendment?

Mr. CLAPP. It is a committee amendment.

Mr. DUBOIS. It is a committee amendment, bearing the recommendation of the Department.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 26 of the bill——

Mr. LODGE. Before we reach that——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest that under the agreement committee amendments are first to be considered. A number of committee amendments have been passed over.

Mr. LODGE. What I desire to address myself to is a committee amendment. I was not going to offer an amendment. It is an amendment which comes before this point is reached.

Mr. DUBOIS. Very well.

Mr. LODGE. I thought we were going to take up the amendments which had been passed over.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what we ought to do.

Mr. CLAPP. There is no objection to that course.

Mr. LODGE. I thought the Senate had begun to take up the passed-over amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the next amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. On page 19 it is proposed to strike out all after line 24 down to and including line 12 on page 20, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That no Army officer shall be engaged in the performance of the duties of Indian agent.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think it possible to dispose of that amendment this evening, unless it is to be disagreed to. There will be a great deal of debate on the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will again be passed over. The Secretary will report the next passed-over amendment.

Mr. CLAPP. Before we go to the next passed-over amendment, I wish to call attention to the necessity or perhaps desirability of striking out in line 8, page 24, the words "at the city of San Francisco, Cal.," and inserting "in such city as the Secretary of the Interior may designate." The suggestion has come from the Department.

Mr. FLINT. I think it will be possible to maintain the warehouse in San Francisco. The present warehouse is in a part of the city that was not destroyed.

Mr. CLAPP. I do not care to press it. It was a suggestion that came to me, and the committee proposed simply to leave it to the Secretary. There is no disposition to take the warehouse away from San Francisco. I withdraw the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota withdraws the amendment.

Mr. KEAN. San Francisco will have proper facilities by the 1st of July.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next passed-over amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The amendment at the bottom of page 53, directing the Court of Claims to adjudicate the claims against the Choctaw Nation of the heirs of Peter P. Pitchlynn, deceased, etc.

Mr. LODGE. That was passed over at the request of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], who is not present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will again be passed over. The next passed-over amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The amendment at the bottom of page 54, removing the restrictions as to the sale, incumbrance, or taxation of lands heretofore allotted to William P. Ross and others.

Mr. LODGE. That amendment was passed over because there was some difference of opinion between the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] and myself, I think, as to whether some of them were full bloods or mixed bloods.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. It was whether the removal of the restrictions had been agreed to by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. That was in controversy, and likewise the question whether or not all of these persons with interesting names—French Youngpig and Mase Squirrel—were full bloods. The Department holds they are full bloods, and it seems the committee reports otherwise.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The committee report holds that they are mixed bloods.

Mr. GALLINGER. The committee does?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the Department thinks that they ought to come out of the bill on the ground that they are full bloods, and that we have recently legislated on this question.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Inasmuch as the removal of the restriction in this case is simply a commercial proposition, I do not know that it is important.

Mr. LODGE. I should think it would do no harm to take out those whom the Department holds to be full bloods.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the amendment reported by the committee?

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to amend it by inserting, in line 1, page 55, after the name "Potts," the word "and;" and by striking out, in line 2, the words "French Youngpig and Mase Squirrel."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next passed-over amendment will be announced.

The SECRETARY. On page 62, the committee report an amendment, to strike out lines 11, 12, 13, and 14, down to and including the word "twenty-seven," in line 15.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask the Senate to disagree to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next passed-over amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The amendment on page 66, beginning in line 7, down to and including line 15.

Mr. LODGE. That is the one on which I made the point of order.

Mr. CLAPP. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that probably under the circumstances it had better be passed over for the present.

Mr. LODGE. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be passed over for the present.

Mr. CLAPP. I move to insert, after line 6, on page 66, the following:

That the restrictions upon alienation of the allotment of Ed. L. Rogers are hereby removed, and patent may issue therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next passed-over amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 73——

Mr. LODGE. That amendment is very long. It has been read. I do not see the Senator from Montana here. There are some amendments I wish to suggest to it.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator from Montana asked that it be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will again be passed over.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, does that complete the committee amendments which have been passed over?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It does, except those further reserved.

Mr. DUBOIS. I have sent an amendment to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 26, after the word "dollars," in line 19, it is proposed to insert:

That if any adult member of the Nez Perce tribe of Indians in Idaho believes himself or herself competent to make leases and transact his or her affairs, such member may file a request with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for a permit to lease the lands which have been allotted to him or her and the minor children of such member.

And if upon consideration and examination of the request, the said Commissioner finds said member to be fully competent and capable of managing and caring for his or her own individual affairs, he may issue a certificate to such member authorizing him or her to make leases or rental contracts for the lands allotted to such member and his or her minor children.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DUBOIS. I offer another amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 48, after line 9, it is proposed to insert the following:

That in addition to the places now provided by law for holding courts in Indian Territory, courts shall be held in the towns of Wetumka and Checotah, and all laws regulating the holding of courts in the Indian Territory shall be applicable to the said courts created in the said towns of Wetumka and Checotah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 44, after line 16, it is proposed to insert as a separate paragraph the following:

That section 15 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved —— ——, 1906, be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting after the word "conveyances," at the end of said section, the following: "Provided, That this section shall not take effect until the date of the dissolution of the tribal governments of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes."

Mr. LODGE. If the amendment to which this is offered is still open to amendment, I desire to offer an amendment to it. I had supposed that the amendment had been agreed to and would not be open to amendment until the bill got into the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that this is a distinct proposition.

Mr. CLAPP. It is.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to the amendment, but it was offered to come in at the middle of the committee amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I simply offer it at this point because it has reference to a kindred subject.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to the Senator's amendment, but I desire to look into the first part of the committee's proviso about additional pay for these clerks. I have been informed, not from the Department, that the first clause gives a very large increase of pay to these clerks and deputy clerks. In some cases it will result in giving them $10,000 a year.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I will be through in a minute. I am not opposing the Senator's amendment at all.

I am informed that it is taken out of money now, under law, devoted to schools. I have sent to the Auditor of the Department of Justice to find out what the salaries and fees of these clerks are, and I should like to know before this amendment is disposed of. But I had assumed that I could not deal with it except in the Senate.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I offer it as an independent paragraph.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. I have no objection at all to it.

Mr. CLAPP. So far as the committee is concerned, we will hold it open for the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. No. I would just as lief deal with it in the Senate.

Mr. CLAPP. It makes no difference.

Mr. LODGE. I only give notice that I do want to look into it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming, the Chair understands, is an independent proposition?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is an independent proposition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. And is to follow after line 16 on page 44.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes; being——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is not an amendment to the committee amendment immediately preceding?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is in order.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There is no objection to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming is agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to offer another amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The additional amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 14, on page 55, it is proposed to insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to make further investigation of the character, extent, and value of the coal deposits in and under the segregated coal lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, Indian Territory; and in order that said investigation may be thoroughly practical and exhaustive the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That any and all information obtained under the provisions of this act shall be available at all times for the use of the Congress and its committees.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the first two or three lines of the amendment be reread.

The Secretary read as requested.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. On page 15 an amendment was agreed to. I think I was absent at the moment. I wish to call attention to the proviso. I do not know whether anything has been done with the proviso.

Mr. GALLINGER. Nothing has been done with it.

Mr. LODGE. If nothing has been done with the proviso, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that it might be well to omit the proviso.

Mr. CLAPP. That is simply copied from the law which it amends. It is the law as it reads now.

Mr. LODGE. What law?

Mr. CLAPP. The law approved March 2, 1899.

Mr. LODGE. That law was repealed by section 23 of the act of February 28, 1902, so far as Indian lands in the Indian Territory and Oklahoma are concerned. Rights of way and additional ground in those Territories are granted by the act of February 28, 1902, which act gives the railroads all the necessary legislation and which repealed the act you are here amending so far as those Territories are concerned.

Mr. CLAPP. We amend section 2 of the act approved March 2, 1899, and the object of the amendment is to enlarge the right of acquiring depot grounds.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. We read that change into the old law.

Mr. LODGE. My point is that this proviso amends a repealed act.

Mr. CLAPP. I am not so certain about that. It is possible the Senator——

Mr. LODGE. I may be mistaken about it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not think you are.

Mr. LODGE. Strike it out, and then it can be looked into in conference.

Mr. CLAPP. It can be looked into in conference.

Mr. LODGE. I merely desired to call the Senator's attention to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment heretofore agreed to will be considered as open, and the amendment to it proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, line 24, after the word "road," strike out the colon and insert a period, and strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to, and the amendment as amended is agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Minnesota if he desires to proceed further with the bill this afternoon? I presume it will have to go over.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; in the absence of Senators who wish to take up certain matters.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, April 25, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate April 24, 1906.

PROMOTION IN THE NAVY.

OHIO.

George H. Clark to be postmaster at Canton, in the county of Stark and State of Ohio.

OKLAHOMA.

Milton C. Garber, of Oklahoma, to be associate justice of the supreme court of the Territory of Oklahoma.

NEW YORK.

Frank B. Dodge to be postmaster at Mount Morris, in the county of Livingston and State of New York.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Allen P. Dickey to be postmaster at Waynesburg, in the county of Greene and State of Pennsylvania.

David Russell to be postmaster at Renovo, in the county of Clinton and State of Pennsylvania.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 25, 1906.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on the request of Mr. GALLINGER, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

FINDINGS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings of fact filed by the court in the cause of Elam C. Cooper v. The United States; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SEYMOUR HOWELL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 23d instant, the papers in connection with the case of Maj. Seymour Howell v. The United States; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented the petition of Cope Whitehouse, of Newport, R. I., relative to certain acts of the Government of Great Britain in the Ottoman Empire inimical to the interests of American citizens; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of 119 citizens of Mabel, Minn., praying for an investigation of the charges made and filed against Hon. REED SMOOT, a Senator from the State of Utah; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. BURNHAM presented petitions of the New Hampshire State Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Peterboro, N. H.; of the Peerless Motor Car Company, of Cleveland, Ohio, and of Local Union No. 111, Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators, and Paper Hangers of America, of Lynn, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation to remove the duty on denaturized alcohol; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Edwin A. Abbey and 65 other members of the American Free Art League, praying for the enactment of legislation to remove the duty on works of art; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BLACKBURN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Berea and Burning Springs, all in the State of Kentucky, praying for an investigation into the existing conditions in the Kongo Free State; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LONG presented a petition of Manhattan Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Manhattan, Kans., and a petition of Edgerton Grange, No. 435, Patrons of Husbandry, of Edgerton, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to remove the duty on denaturized alcohol; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BEVERIDGE presented a petition of the Woman's Club of Kentland, Ind., praying that an appropriation be made for a scientific investigation into the industrial conditions of women in the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of sundry Army nurses of Terre Haute, South Bend, Petersburg, Elkhart, Indianapolis, Urbana, Auburn, Logansport, and Pendleton, all in the State of Indiana, praying for the enactment of legislation to increase the pension of Army nurses; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOPKINS presented a memorial of Local Division No. 228, Amalgamated Association of Street and Electric Railway Employees of America, of Joliet, Ill., remonstrating against the repeal of the present Chinese-exclusion law; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

A bill (S. 5866) for the relief of the trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, of Clarksburg, W. Va.; and

A bill (S. 5867) for the relief of the trustees of the Baptist Church of Gauley Bridge, W. Va.

Mr. BACON introduced a bill (S. 5868) to change the name of North Capitol street to Georgia avenue; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BERRY introduced a bill (S. 5869) for the relief of Larvan Gordon; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BURKETT introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 5870) granting an increase of pension to S. H. Morrison; and

A bill (S. 5871) granting an increase of pension to William B. Ashton.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 5873) to provide for the transfer to naval control of that portion of the Industrial Home School property lying within the limits of the Naval Observatory circle, and the establishment of the Industrial Home School upon a new site to be selected by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. MALLORY submitted an amendment relative to the use of Government horses and vehicles by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRAZIER submitted an amendment authorizing the acceptance by the Government of the tract of land where Andrew Johnson's remains now lie, known as "Monument Hill," in Greene County, Tenn., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KITTREDGE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $3,000 for the improvement of the sanitarium springs connected with the Battle Mountain Sanitarium, at Hot Springs, S. Dak., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURKETT submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $120 additional yearly compensation to the person acting as superintendent of the House of Detention in the District of Columbia, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SIMMONS submitted an amendment providing that no part of the appropriation for necessary and special facilities for trunk lines from Washington to Atlanta and New Orleans shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall consider and so find that such expenditure is necessary in order to promote the interests of the postal service, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the post-office appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON TERRITORIES.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (for Mr. BEVERIDGE) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the stenographer employed by the Committee on Territories to report hearings on Senate bill No. 191, and other matters pending before said committee, and the stenographer hereby authorized to be employed by said committee from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such testimony as may be taken by said committee or its subcommittees, in connection with matters pending before it, be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate; and that said committee be authorized to have such testimony printed for its use.

GOVERNMENT HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the bill (H. R. 15643) to authorize the board of visitors of the Government Hospital for the Insane to summon and examine witnesses under oath, and making it a misdemeanor for any such witness to refuse to attend or testify or produce books and papers when summoned be transferred to Rule IX. I make this request for the reason that it provides for an investigation of the Government Hospital for the Insane by the board of visitors, and the House of Representatives has ordered an investigation by a committee of the House. I wish to have the bill transferred to Rule IX, in order that it may not be called in my absence.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go to the Calendar under Rule IX, as requested by the Senator from New Hampshire.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

The bill (S. 4433) to amend an act approved August 3, 1894, entitled "An act concerning leases in the Yellowstone National Park," was announced as first in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from New Hampshire the bill will go over without prejudice.

The bill (S. 30) to remove discriminations against American sailing vessels in the coasting trade was announced as next in order.

Mr. FRYE. Let the bill go over, retaining its place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

The bill (H. R. 14396) to incorporate the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal, to define the powers thereof, and to facilitate interstate commerce was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice.

ALLOTMENT OF INDIAN LANDS IN SEVERALTY.

The bill (H. R. 11946) to amend section 6 of an act approved February 8, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes," was announced as next in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. On April 20 last the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 3, line 2, after the word "removed," to insert "and said land shall not be liable to the satisfaction of any debt contracted prior to the issuing of such patent;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, and he is hereby authorized, whenever he shall be satisfied that any Indian allottee is competent and capable of managing his or her affairs at any time to cause to be issued to such allottee a patent in fee simple, and thereafter all restrictions as to sale, incumbrance, or taxation of said land shall be removed and said land shall not be liable to the satisfaction of any debt contracted prior to the issuing of such patent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 8, to strike out the words "the Five Civilized Tribes" and insert "any Indians in the Indian Territory;" so as to make the additional proviso read:

And provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not extend to any Indians in the Indian Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the bill the following:

That hereafter when an allotment of land is made to any Indian, and any such Indian dies before the expiration of the trust period, said allotment shall be canceled and the land shall revert to the United States, and the Secretary of the Interior shall ascertain the legal heirs of such Indian and shall cause to be issued to said heirs and in their names a patent in fee simple for said land, or he may cause the land to be sold as provided by law and issue a patent therefor to the purchaser or purchasers and pay the net proceeds to the heirs, or their legal representatives, of such deceased Indian. The action of the secretary of the Interior in determining the legal heirs of any deceased Indian, as provided herein, shall in all respects be conclusive and final.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

The bill (S. 4403) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens in the United States," approved March 3, 1903, was announced as next in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There have been submitted by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] amendments to this bill, which have been printed and which are upon the table. Neither of those Senators is in the Chamber.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I suggest that the bill go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill, at the request of the Senator from Vermont, will lie over without prejudice.

FISHING IN ALASKAN WATERS.

Mr. FRYE. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 267) to prohibit aliens from fishing in the waters of Alaska, to report it back and move that the Senate disagree to the House amendment and ask a conference on the same, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. FRYE, Mr. LODGE, and Mr. BACON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I should like to have the unfinished business laid before the Senate, so that we can see who is ready to speak on it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have no notice of any Senator being ready to speak this morning, and while I have had some intimation from two or three Senators that they were preparing speeches, they seem to be taking a great deal more time about it than I think would be necessary, although I may be mistaken. I say so with all due respect. The Senate has a great many important matters ahead of it, and it appears to me, as the general debate seems to be about over, that we might reach some agreement about a time to vote. I should like to suggest to Senators to let us come to an agreement about voting, if it is practicable.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should not think it practicable at this time.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course if the Senator does not feel willing to agree, that settles it for to-day, and I will have to try it again some other time.

Mr. HALE. May I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. HALE. I judge from what I hear Senators say that there is a general feeling that we ought pretty soon to come to some agreement about a vote. I rise principally to ask the Senator who is marshaling this debate what is his notion about the extent of the general debate that we are going on with now? In looking over his lists and knowing of Senators who have informed him that they expect to speak, when does the Senator think that that part of the debate will be ended, if he has any idea?

Mr. TILLMAN. I have no idea, Mr. President, because Senators who have spoken of their desire to speak have never indicated when they would address the Senate. Some of them said that at one time or another they would want to speak, and have since notified me that they have changed their minds and did not care to do it. I have never been able to get a list in the last ten days of any direct and positive information as to a Senator's wanting to address the Senate on this question. I would think, under those circumstances, the balance of this week would consume all the time that would be reasonably devoted to general speeches. But I may be in error, you know; we can not tell.

Mr. HALE. This is now Wednesday. Then the Senator thinks that by the end of the session of Saturday—I think we will probably sit on Saturday this week—the long speeches, what is called "general debate" in the House, will be ended.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, I could not say that that is my opinion, because I have so little upon which to base it; but I will say, it appears to me if the Senate would agree on a day, even two weeks from to-day, or two weeks from next Monday, when we would begin the debate on the bill and its amendments under the ten-minute rule, and fix a day four or five days later for a vote on everything and wind it up, it would at least put Senators on notice that if they did not get ready with their general speeches they would not have a chance to make them. While I do not want to have the appearance of dragooning or driving or marshaling speakers, or anything of that sort, I am exceedingly anxious to get the matter to some sort of termination.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator is entirely right about that. He sees that now we are listening to very good speeches, very educating speeches——

Mr. TILLMAN. We are getting a great deal of information.

Mr. HALE. But we are drifting rather aimlessly, so far as there being any likelihood of fixing a time. The process in the Senate always is on important matters that it is able to come to a conclusion.

Mr. TILLMAN. If I were to begin to serve notice and say, "Gentlemen, either talk or vote and do the business before the Senate, unless a majority of Senators vote to take it out and quit," I could be absolved from any blame for this delay; but I have never seen that that sort of a driving process amounts to very much here, and I do not want to engage in it.

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. TILLMAN. I much prefer to have the thing move along in the easy and, as some people say, in the happy-go-lucky way in which we do things here. But I have never characterized our procedure in that manner. Still I do believe Senators ought to get ready if they want to make general speeches, and not have the appearance of unduly delaying this legislation.

Mr. HALE. That is undoubtedly practically all we shall do on the bill to-day. With this general feeling that Senators can get in their speeches this week we can then perhaps agree upon some time.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from South Carolina that if permitted by the Senate I will be glad to submit some observations on this bill to-morrow after the morning business.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am very sure the Senate will be glad to hear the Senator, and certainly I will be very glad to hear him.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, there has been no undue delay in the consideration of this bill, and at the proper time undoubtedly an agreement will be made to vote upon it. There never has been any disinclination on the part of the Senate that I have been aware of to fix the time for taking a vote when the discussion was exhausted, and I presume there will be no alteration in that general plan in the discussion of the pending bill. I can see no occasion for any suggestions or attempts to lecture the Senate as to what it ought to do in this matter. If there has been any delay at all it has been by excursions into outside matters by Senators who in a sense are in control of the bill. I hope we shall not hear any more talk of undue delay, for there has been none, and there will be none.

Mr. TILLMAN. If there is no Senator who is ready to go on to-day, I ask that the unfinished business be laid aside for the balance of the day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina asks that the unfinished business be laid aside for the day. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I wish to give notice that I will ask leave to address the Senate on some features of the bill next Friday after the morning business.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to have the Senate now resume the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15331) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first amendment passed over is on page 66.

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to offer some amendments on behalf of the committee. First, I offer an amendment to the amendment which was passed over on page 66.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota proposes an amendment, which will be read.

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to this amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 66, line 15, after the word "purpose," the last word in the paragraph, insert:

Provided, The Secretary of the Interior shall first examine said accounts and approve the same.

Mr. LODGE. That is perfectly satisfactory. I withdraw the point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to. The Senator from Massachusetts withdraws his point of order, and the amendment as amended is agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. I offer an amendment from the Department of the Interior.

The SECRETARY. On page 53, at the end of line 5, insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States belonging to the Chickasaw Nation, the amount due the State National Bank of Denison, Tex., upon a note given by the governor and treasurer of the Chickasaw Nation, under an act entitled "An act authorizing and requesting the governor and treasurer of the Chickasaw Nation to borrow the sum of $26,195.35 to pay the expenses of the present session of the legislature, exclusive of the $4 per day allowed by law for the expenses of the members and officers of the present session of the legislature," approved by the governor of the Chickasaw Nation on December 20, 1905.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. I offer the following amendment, which is a bill I introduced earlier in the session at the request of the Department. It does not seem to get through the other House, and I take the liberty of offering it as an amendment here.

The SECRETARY. On page 68 of the bill, after line 8, insert:

That for the purpose of preserving the living and growing timber on the ten sections of land in the Chippewa of the Mississippi Indian Reservation, in the State of Minnesota, reserved from sale or settlement in accordance with the provisions of the act of January 14, 1889, as amended by the act of June 27, 1902, the Secretary of the Interior, under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe, may sell, at not less than a minimum price to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, the down timber, both merchantable and unmerchantable, the latter to be sold as cord wood, on said ten sections, as well as the hay on the meadow lands therein. Prior to the sale the timber shall be suitably designated by the superintendent of logging or one of the assistant superintendents of logging, appointed under the act of June 27, 1902, for which no additional compensation shall be allowed, or by some person designated by the Secretary of the Interior. Payment for the timber and for the hay shall be made to the Indian agent at the Leech Lake Agency, and the money arising therefrom, after defraying the expenses incident to the sale, shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of all Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota, as a part of the permanent fund provided for by section 7 of the act of January 14, 1889. Notice of the proposed sale shall be given for not less than thirty days in at least two newspapers having a general circulation in the county in which the ten sections are situated. Should no bid be accepted for the timber, the Secretary of the Interior may permit, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, the use for firewood of the unmerchantable down timber on said ten sections, free of charge, by bona fide settlers and residents not residing on said ten sections.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. I understand the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has a few amendments which he desires to offer.

Mr. GALLINGER. On page 12, line 13, I move to amend the committee amendment, if it shall be open for that purpose——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will regard the amendment as open.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to amend the committee amendment by substituting the words "twenty-five" for "twenty" at the beginning of the line.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, line 13, before the word "thousand," strike out "twenty" in the committee amendment, which has been agreed to, and insert in lieu the words "twenty-five;" so as to read:

To enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to take action to suppress the traffic of intoxicating liquors among Indians, $25,000," etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. In the same line, after the word "dollars," I move to strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen;" so as to read:

Fifteen thousand dollars of which to be used exclusively in the Indian Territory.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. After the words "Indian Territory," in line 14, I move to insert "and Oklahoma;" so as to read:

To be used exclusively in the Indian Territory and Oklahoma.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer the following amendment, which I have reason to believe the chairman of the committee will not object to.

The SECRETARY. On page 113, after line 12, insert after the committee amendment already agreed to:

That any missionary society or religious organization now occupying, under proper authority, for religious or educational work among the Indians, any of the lands in the Territory of Oklahoma heretofore ceded to the United States by the Wichita and affiliated bands of Indians, or by the Comanche, Kiowa, and Apache tribes of Indians, and reserved to such societies or organizations for such religious uses on the schedules of allotments approved by the Secretary of the Interior, shall have the right for two years within which to make application for a patent therefor; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed, upon such application, to issue patents in fee to such religious societies or organizations, severally, for such lands so occupied, not to exceed 160 acres to any one society or organization.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I offer an amendment to come in as a separate paragraph at line 20, page 36.

The SECRETARY. On page 36, after line 20, insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and empowered to segregate and reserve from allotment, and to cancel any filings or applications that may heretofore have been made with a view to allotting, the following-described lands, situate in the Choctaw Nation, Ind. T., to wit: The northwest quarter of section 12, in township 5 north, range 15 east, containing in the aggregate 160 acres more or less.

That the provisions of sections 56 to 63, inclusive, of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1902, entitled "An act to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes, and for other purposes," be, and the same are hereby, made applicable to the lands above described, the same as if the said described lands had been made a part of the segregation as contemplated by said sections 56 to 63, inclusive, of said above act approved July 1, 1902: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, add to and make a part of the coal mining leases now in effect, and to which said lands are contiguous, the northwest quarter of section 12, in township 5 north, of range 15 east, Government subdivisions being followed as nearly as possible: Provided further, That the holder or holders of the lease or leases to which such lands shall be added shall, before the same are added, pay the Indian or Indians who have filed upon or applied for such lands as their allotments, or who are in possession thereof, the value of the improvements placed on the land by said Indian or Indians, such value to be determined under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I ask leave to offer an amendment on page 162, which I send to the desk. I will make a brief statement concerning it.

The SECRETARY. On page 162, after line 21, insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Henry W. Lee, out of the funds of the Winnebago Indians of Wisconsin, the sum of $2,000, being the amount found due said Lee by the Court of Claims in Congressional case No. 10219.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to say that that is a finding by the Court of Claims. It was sent to the Court of Claims by an act of Congress. The party claimed $10,000; the Secretary of the Interior said he was entitled to $3,000, and the Court of Claims gave him $2,000. So I suppose there will be no trouble about it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The only committee amendment remaining undisposed of is that on page 73, beginning with line 16, in reference to the Blackfeet Reservation.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to offer an amendment. On page 50, after line 6, I move to insert the paragraph which I send to the desk, for the establishment of an additional court in the Indian Territory.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 50, at the end of line 6, it is proposed to insert:

That in addition to the places now provided by law for holding court in the central judicial district of Indian Territory, terms of the district court of the central district shall hereafter be held at the town of Hugo; and the United States judge of said central district is hereby authorized to establish by metes and bounds a recording district for said court, which district shall be known as recording district No. 31; that all laws regulating the holding of courts and the recording of instruments in the Indian Territory shall be applicable to the court hereby created at the town of Hugo.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Montana. On page 74 I offer an amendment to the amendment of the committee, which I send to the desk.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, that amendment has not yet been disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has been passed over. It is yet undisposed of.

Mr. LODGE. It is yet undisposed of. That is all right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 74, line 11, before the word "acres," in the amendment reported by the committee, it is proposed to strike out "one hundred and twenty," and to insert "two hundred and forty;" and in line 13, before the word "acres," it is proposed to strike out "one hundred and sixty" and insert "three hundred and twenty;" so as to make the proviso read:

And provided further, That there shall be allotted to each adult or head of family 80 acres of irrigable land and 240 acres of additional land valuable only for grazing purposes, or, at the option of the allottee, the entire 320 acres may be taken in land valuable only for grazing purposes, and to each person under 18 years of age one-half of such acreage, respectively, etc.

Mr. CLARK of Montana. This amendment is simply to correct an error in the printing, and was agreed upon in committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs, beginning on page 7, line 19, and extending to line 10, on page 8, was adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin moves to reconsider the vote by which the amendment to which he refers was adopted. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, after line 18, the amendment proposed by the Committee on Indian Affairs was to insert:

That when the land of deceased allottees has been sold under existing laws, the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed to immediately cause to be paid to the heirs of said deceased allottees any and all moneys on deposit due said heirs from the sale of said land of said deceased persons, and that he be further directed to cause to be paid immediately upon collection all moneys due Indian allottees or their heirs as the proceeds of leases upon individual allotments: Provided, That no money accruing from any lease or sale of lands held in trust by the United States for any Indian shall become liable to be subjected to the payment of any debt of, or claim against, such Indian contracted or arising during such trust period, or, in case of a minor, during his minority, except with the approval and consent of the Secretary of the Interior, who is hereby vested with full power and authority to do and perform all things necessary hereunder.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to reconsider the vote by which this amendment was adopted.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. I suppose I ought now to move that the amendment be rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior are opposed to the adoption of this amendment. I think the reasons which lead to the position of the Department are well founded. I send to the desk, and ask to have read, a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, which will pretty well inform the Senate as to the grounds upon which the Department is opposed to this amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read the letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, as requested by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, April 24, 1906.

Hon. JOHN C. SPOONER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR SPOONER: I am in receipt of a copy of a letter addressed by Agent Campbell, of the La Pointe Agency, to a friend of his, relative to a newspaper dispatch from Washington saying that "the Indian Committee of the Senate has clashed with the Interior Department officials in the matter of handling the affairs of the Chippewa Indians on the reservations of the La Pointe Agency, Wis. This is shown by the report of the chairman, CLAPP, of the committee in proposing amendments to the Indian appropriation bill, directing that the policy which was adopted, under the regulation of the Department, for the withholding of the funds of the Indians and permitting them to have but $10 per month shall be abandoned, and the Indians shall have the money deposited to their credit in the banks, and draw from it as they may choose."

I desire to invite your attention to the following extracts from Agent Campbell's letter relative to the existing conditions and the results that would follow the change of the present policy of the Department as to the funds of the Chippewa Indians.

Mr. Campbell says:

"If every person thoroughly understood the policy of the Department, and knew the conditions as the Indian agent knows them, there would be no difficulty in having every Senator and Congressman to support the policy.

"For you to thoroughly understand this policy it will be necessary for me to go back to the beginning and state the facts and the condition of this agency when I took charge of it.

"It was the policy at that time for the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the agent to pay each year to the Indians the money derived from the timber cut in the winter, and when I took charge of the agency there was very little money to the credit of the Indians, as it had all been paid out to them in lump sums.

"After investigating the matter thoroughly I found that the majority of the money went to the grafters and the saloons and that improvements were not being made, which should be made with this money. After thorough consideration the $10 per month policy was adopted by myself, and with the approval of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, which was this:

"Every Indian who had a credit in this office was entitled to draw $10 per month, and if he desired money for improvements an application was made to the Commissioner, recommended by the agent, and the application was always approved by the Commissioner if the money was to be used for some good purpose. When the money was paid over, the farmer, as far as he was able, directed that the money be expended as per the application.

"If we thought an Indian capable of handling his own money and he could give good reasons for receiving it, we paid the money over to him in a lump sum. Others were permitted to purchase farms outside of the reservation. Many made improvements on their allotments, and I would state that on the Bad River Reservation there are some one hundred families living on their allotments who have from 1 to 60 acres cleared, all of which was done when they found they could not use their money for any other purpose than improvements.

"Now, the foregoing was the $10 per month policy. Since this has been in force I have recommended that some fifty or more old Indians who have a sufficient amount of money to keep them comfortable during the remainder of their lives should draw $20 per month, and they are now drawing that amount each month.

"This was the best plan I could think of to protect the Indians and make them use their money in such a way that it would be of a benefit to themselves and make them self-supporting in the future when their money was all gone.

"If I am proud of anything that I have done since I have been agent, it is that I have guarded and protected these poor old Indians from grafters and others who wish to take their money from them without any consideration whatever.

"We have hundreds of poor old Indians who are not able to work. The opportunities of fishing, hunting, trapping, picking berries, making maple sugar, and all other industries by which they supported themselves in the past have been entirely taken away from them by the white men, and if their money was paid over to them in a lump sum I would venture to say that not one of them would have any of it left inside of thirty days. This has been demonstrated beyond a doubt several times, as in every case where I thought the Indians were capable of taking their money and have paid it over to them in a lump sum I have found them lacking.

"I obtained permission from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for fifteen or twenty Indians to purchase farms outside of the reservation, and out of this number only two that I can call to mind now have made a success of it. All of the others have tried to dispose of their farms for little or nothing, and some have been sold for taxes; others have had executions issued against them. I have had to come to the rescue at different times and have had to pay out money of my own in order to save the farms from grafters.

"The trouble with these Indians is that they have never had any experience in finance. To pay them their money would be like paying over to a child 10 years old eight or ten thousand dollars and turn him out. How long would he hold it? They do not know what to do with it, as they have never had any experience in any way, and the proper thing to do is to teach them gradually how to handle it and how to make themselves self-supporting.

"In the clipping sent to you yesterday it was stated that this policy was adopted and used for the benefit of the banks and the lumber barons. This policy was first recommended by myself, and if it is being used to the interests of the lumber barons and the banks, then I am the grafter and the man who is receiving the benefit of this policy. And if these banks and the lumber barons (so called by the paper) have anyone aiding and assisting them in this policy, it certainly must be me, as they can not receive any benefit from this policy unless I enter into league with them, because all checks for all bills of every description must pass through my hands.

"Now, it is claimed that these lumbermen have the use of this money, and which is not the whole truth. They do not say that the lumbermen pay any interest on this money.

"As I stated before, there was very little money at this agency until this policy was adopted; then the money commenced to accumulate. I recommended that this money should be placed out at interest, and security taken, so as to protect the Indians against any loss. The outcome of this was that I was placed under a $300,000 bond, which was afterwards increased to $400,000. At the commencement of the third year that I was agent I put this money out at interest, and since that time the Indians have received interest on whatever amount they had to their credit. About June, 1905, this money was placed in five different national banks.

"These banks gave bonds to the Department as security for this money, at which time my bond was decreased from $400,000 to $100,000, but the clipping which the reporter sent from Washington to the Chicago Record-Herald does not give any of these facts, and which he could have obtained from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs at any time.

"The question is, Is it best to pay over a half million dollars or more to these Indians in a lump sum, or is it better to see that the money is put into improvements which will make them self-supporting in the future? I know it is slow work, but I know that there have been three or four times the improvements made since this policy was adopted than were ever made before.

"If this amendment passes the Senate the suffering of these poor old Indians in the future will be unlimited, and will be beyond description. You know that charity is cold, and the white man does not wish to pay taxes to support the poor white people; he avoids it if possible. How much less will he be willing to support the poor Indian?

"Let me give you an example of one of these old Indians: Wa nab bo zho has just left my office. He is 85 years of age. He has a cancer or some disease which has eaten off the entire nose and a part of his face. He has a little over $3,000 to his credit in this office. He is now receiving $20 per month, and I make applications from time to time for additional amounts when he is in need of it. I recently made an application for $100 to purchase certain articles for his comfort. If his money is properly handled this man has a sufficient amount to keep him during his lifetime, but if his money was paid over to him in a lump sum to-day in one week he would not have one cent of it left, and he would be a pauper, and would starve and suffer the rest of his life. Do you advocate my paying over this money to him in a lump sum, knowing this to be a fact?

"I have several hundred people under my charge who are situated very much as this man is; they are old—not so old as this man is, but from 60 years up. I do not know of one of them that would have a cent left in a week's time if this money was paid over to them. They do not know what to do with it, and the first thing that would be done would be to steer them into a saloon. If they had $500 when they went in, they would have none of it when they came out.

"I could give you example after example of cases where I have paid the money over to these unfortunate creatures, and it has never done them a particle of good. I make this assertion, that it would be better to burn this money in the streets than to pay it over to them in a lump sum. I know this from personal contact with the Indians during the past eight years.

"Let me repeat a part of what I have said before, and that is, if anyone is to blame for this policy it is the agent, and not the Department at Washington, and I am willing to take the responsibility as I recommend it; and if the policy is for the benefit of the banks and the lumber barons I am responsible for it, and not the Department at Washington. If anyone is doing grafting here I must be in cahoots with him, because, as I said before, it could not be done without my knowing it, as all checks pass through my hands and I have to sign them.

"You may think it is strange that I should write to you in this manner in regard to this money matter, and why I should take such an interest in protecting it for the Indians. I want to say emphatically, with all the honesty of purpose that I ever had, that I have taken as much interest, or more, in the affairs of the Indians than I ever did in my own personal business. I have always endeavored to do what was right and fair by them, and I do not fear an investigation concerning the same as far as myself and the Department are concerned.

"I could cover many pages by giving you examples of cases similar to that of Wna nab bo zho, which I have already given you; also of Indians who have received all of their money, and when the money was gone have come back to me crying and blaming me for paying the money over to them in a lump sum. Page after page of such things could be written to you, but what is the use?"

In a letter to the Secretary on April 16, 1906, commenting on various Senate committee amendments to the Indian appropriation bill, a copy of which was furnished you, the Commissioner, as to the provision directing that all money accruing from the sale of timber on allotments be immediately paid to the allottees or their heirs (p. 7, lines 1 to 8), said:

"It should be eliminated.

"There is about $35,900 to the credit of allottees under the supervision of the Leech Lake Agency, Minn., which accrued from the sale of timber on their allotments. The regulations provide that the money shall be deposited in some national bank to their credit, and that it may be withdrawn with the consent of this Office. The present regulations and the contracts under which the sales are made, La Pointe Agency, Wis., provide that the money shall be deposited in some national bank, subject to the check of the Indian owner of the allotment when countersigned by the agent. There is about $500,000 of this money to the credit of the Indians under the jurisdiction of La Pointe Agency. It is deposited in selected banks, which pay interest at the rate of 2 per cent on daily balances and 2½ per cent on six and twelve months' time deposits. The Government has used every precaution to safeguard the interests of the Indians with reference to their timber money, and it would be demoralizing in the extreme to pay this money to them. Any allottee who is shown to be competent to manage his own affairs and will satisfy the Office that he will properly and profitably invest his money may withdraw the amount to his credit in a lump sum. No application has been refused where this showing has been made."

In addition to the moneys received from the sale of timber there have been deposited in national banks throughout the country, secured by surety company bonds, in the neighborhood of $2,000,000 derived from the sale of inherited Indian lands. The amendment in the bill authorizes the turning over to the several Indian beneficiaries this large sum of money. There has been inherited Indian land sold to the amount of between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000, and prior to September 30, 1904, the proceeds derived from these sales were turned over to the Indian beneficiaries.

The necessity for the conserving of these funds was brought directly to the attention of the office by a report of a special United States Indian agent relating to the conditions existing at the Yankton Agency, S. Dak., as a result of the payment to the Indians without restrictions the moneys derived from this source. He said that there was no doubt in his mind that the sale of inherited Indian lands on that reservation was proving very demoralizing to the Indians, which opinion was shared by everyone at all conversant with the situation, and even admitted by those who made it a business to purchase the lands. He reported that the Indians at that time had practically quit work; that dancing, feasting, and the giving away of property occupied their time; that during the Fourth of July festivities, 1904, there was a general shifting of personal property, in which the more shrewd secured the horses, carriages, blankets, harness, and saddles of the more vain and boastful "givers;" that many thousand dollars worth of property was given away; that it was nothing uncommon for an Indian who had received money from the sale of inherited land to pass out five-dollar bills and ten-dollar bills as a treat, the same as one might the contents of a basket of apples; that in addition there were creditors who stripped the Indians of all their money within a few hours after they received it; and as an illustration he cited the case of John Prettybull, an Indian living in the town of Wagner, S. Dak.

The special agent said that the Indian agent in charge of the reservation called him into his room to see the land money paid over to this Indian; that after the court costs and attorneys' fees were deducted there was left $3,120, which sum was placed in Prettybull's hands by the agent; that the poor fellow looked helpless and dazed, with his arms full of currency, and he (the Indian) told the agent that he wished to keep out $200 and deposit the balance in bank. The cashier of one of the Wagner banks who was present announced that he had some deposit slips with him and would take whatever Prettybull wished to deposit. A mixed blood present in the room stepped up and said that Prettybull owed him $600 for horses and borrowed money and had promised him $500 on account. The agent ejected the mixed blood from the room, but Prettybull decided to deposit but $2,500, took $620 in currency and a deposit slip for the balance. This was about 3 o'clock in the afternoon. At 9 o'clock the next morning Prettybull did not have a dollar in the bank, and creditors were coming down to see the agent and the special agent, complaining that others had "hogged" the game; that the following day Prettybull's wife came to see the agent, and the special agent was called in to listen to her story, which was as follows:

That Prettybull had received about $3,000 only a few weeks previous; that it was all gone, and there were practically no assets to show for the money, but an alarming schedule of unpaid debts. This same Prettybull had at that time advertised for sale something over 600 acres more land, for which he would receive about $15,000.

United States District Attorney J. M. Elliott, who lives in Tyndall, adjacent to the Yankton Agency, told the special agent of several instances of the Indians' money being dissipated parallel to the Prettybull case.

This squandering of money, he reported, was not confined to the ignorant and uneducated Indians. He was told by Mr. Elliott of the case of David Zephier, an educated quarter breed. This man received $2,500 from the sale of the allotments of his deceased children. He took a time certificate of deposit for $1,200. The next day he discounted this time certificate at another bank. By noon of the following day not only had his time certificate got back to the bank, but also checks for his temporary deposit and $400 in overdrafts.

He reported that there were a number of men in Wagner (and this statement has been corroborated time and time again and it can be vouched for as representing the true conditions (whose sole business was to traffic with Indians who were about to sell inherited land. They are not merchants, have no stock of goods, but remained in wait for their prey. Horses, carriages, harness, and saddles were their favorite means of capturing the Indians' money. The men would secure a gaudy-looking team and outfit and approach an Indian who was soon to have land money. The team would be offered on time at an extravagant price; the bait was rendered more tempting by an offer of a cash loan, conditioned on the sale, of from $10 to $25. The most successful of these Indian horse traders was one Thomas Harney, who was reputed at that time to have made $20,000 per year out of the Indians in this business.

The conditions existing at that time at the Yankton Agency, as above related, is a fair sample of the conditions at all agencies where inherited Indian lands had been sold. Horses, wagons, and harness were sold to the Indians at exorbitant prices. Actually a span of horses sold by a white man to another white man for $55 was sold to an Indian for $270. They paid down on the purchases really more than their actual value; mortgages were taken by the sellers for the balance of the purchase prices, and the Indians, having no sources from which to secure money to pay the balance, defaulted. The sellers took the property from the Indians to satisfy their claims for the balance. Thereafter the same property was sold again to the Indians, in some instances at an advance over the first price, and the same operation was repeated, the articles finally lodging in the hands of the original sellers, although the Indians had paid from two to three times their actual value.

A case is reported from the Kickapoo Agency, Kans., where a very old Indian woman whose title to certain allotments was so clear that there could be no question about it was induced to hire an attorney to probate the estates, and this attorney charged a fee of $1,052.85, when persons familiar with the costs in such cases freely said that $100 would have been a large fee. Fortunately the money derived from the sale of these allotments was not turned over to the Indian woman, but was held under Government control. There were other claims presented against this woman aggregating $3,000 in addition to this attorney's fee. The total amount of the proceeds derived from the sale was $7,019.

Hundreds of actual cases could be cited where claims have been presented against Indians which it was discovered after investigation embraced charges for articles from three to ten times their actual value.

In his letter hereinbefore referred to, the Commissioner, regarding the provision authorizing the payment of the proceeds of the sale of inherited Indian lands to the heirs, page 7, line 19, to page 8, line 1, said:

"This amendment reverses the practice of the office under the regulations of the Department and requires the immediate payment of all moneys derived from the sale of inherited lands or leasing of allotments, to the heirs or allottees without regard to their character or business ability. Experience has shown that in many cases such payment would not only result in no advantage to the Indian, but must be a positive injury to him.

"I am strongly opposed to this amendment in its present form. I am, however, in favor of allowing Indians who have some appreciation of the value of money and are fairly competent to manage their affairs, to receive the money due them.

"If the amendment be modified so as to continue the necessary protection of those who are improvident or wholly unable to handle money with discretion, it will meet with my approval. To accomplish this I suggest the following amendments:

"After the word 'allottees,' in line 22, page 7, insert the words 'who shall show to his satisfaction that they are competent to manage their own business affairs;' after the word 'due,' in line 25, page 7, the word 'competent;' and after the word 'their,' in line 25, and before the word 'heirs,' in line 1, page 8, the word 'competent.' There should be added after the word 'allotments,' in line 1, page 8, the words 'and all other moneys, the proceeds from the sale of lands of deceased allottees and of leases of individual allotments, shall be held under Government control.'"

Referring to your inquiry by telephone concerning the amount of money to the credit of the Indians of the La Pointe Agency and the amount in the hands of the contractors, I have to say that there is about $500,000 to the credit of allottees of the Lac Courte Oreille, Lac du Flambeau, Bad River, and Red Cliff reservations, Wis., arising from the sale of timber on their allotments. The banks pay 2 per cent on average daily balances to be credited at the end of each month, and 2½ per cent on six and twelve months time deposits. The contractors are not now and have not since the banks have been selected been allowed to retain the money. The money accruing during any month is collected from the contractors at the close of the month and deposited in the banks to the credit of the Indians. The banks have given bonds, with surety companies as sureties, guaranteeing the faithful accounting for the principal and interest, and contractors are all under bond, with surety companies as sureties, guaranteeing the payment for the timber, and the full compliance with the regulations.

Very respectfully,

C. F. LARRABEE,
Acting Commissioner.

Mr. CLAPP. In view of the absence of the Senator who offered these amendments, who is a member of the committee, I would suggest that they be passed for the present, and that we take up the consideration of the other undisposed of amendments which will not require much time.

Mr. SPOONER. That is entirely agreeable and right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over, as requested by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to offer an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina proposes an amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] asks to be permitted to offer one first, and I will wait.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. The committee had under consideration the claim of the Kickapoo Indians, which was provided for in the bill, but which went out on a point of order day before yesterday or yesterday, and it gave a good deal of consideration to that claim. I think every member of the committee will agree that we thought it was a matter which ought to be adjusted. But as in the shape in which it is now it can not be adjusted, I desire to send the controversy to the Court of Claims, where the Government and the Indians will have an opportunity to present the matter just as it is. I have a statement of the facts here, but I do not desire to occupy the time of the Senate by reading it.

Mr. LODGE. What page is that on?

Mr. TELLER. I am going to move to put it on page 106. I think the draft here is carefully drawn and will leave the matter entirely with the court, and of course the Government will intervene. It is certainly a case which in common justice ought to be adjusted, and I do not know any better way than to send it to the Court of Claims.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. TELLER. I will send the amendment to the desk. It should come on page 106, after line 8. I have here a statement of this controversy which is not at all creditable to the Government. Yet it is like a great many other things that have happened. I do not myself see any other way to adjust this matter than to send it to some court where it can be considered carefully. It calls for an amount not very great, considering that we bought the land for 32 cents an acre and sold it for a dollar and fifty cents an acre, and this is to recover the difference between 32 cents and a dollar and a half. This land was the property of these Indians. The Government exchanged this land, which was the property of these Indians, for other land. It was not a gift by the Government. In a similar case the Supreme Court declared that the Government should not make anything off its wards; that whatever the Government got should be paid to the wards. I believe this would be a fair adjustment. I ask that the amendment may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert, after line 8, on page 106, the following:

That all claims of whatsoever nature which said Mexican Kickapoo Indians of Oklahoma may have, or claim to have, against the United States shall be submitted to the Court of Claims, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States by either party, for the determination of the amount due, or claimed to be due, said Kickapoo Indians from the United States under any treaties or laws of Congress, or for the misappropriation of any lands or funds of said Kickapoo Indians, or for the failure of the United States to pay said Indians any money due; and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine all claims of said Kickapoo Indians against the United States and to enter judgment thereon, and in so doing to take into consideration and determine the validity or invalidity of all treaties and agreements made between said Indians and the United States. If any question is submitted to said court, it shall settle the rights, both legal and equitable, of said Kickapoo Indians, notwithstanding lapse of time or statute of limitations. Such action in the Court of Claims shall be presented by a single petition to be filed within one year after the Secretary of the Interior furnishes the data provided for herein. Said action shall make the Mexican Kickapoo Indians of Oklahoma party plaintiff and the United States party defendant, and shall set forth all the facts on which said Kickapoo Indians base their claim for recovery; and the said petition may be verified by any attorney who may be employed by said Indians. Said verification may be upon information and belief as to the existence of such facts, and no other statement or verification shall be necessary. Official letters, papers, reports, documents, and public records, or certified copies thereof, may be used in evidence. Whatever moneys may be found to be due the said Mexican Kickapoo Indians of Oklahoma under the provisions of this section shall be, by the Secretary of the Treasury, paid to the individual members who may be living at the date of judgment rendered in the Court of Claims. The Secretary of the Interior shall furnish to the Kickapoo Indians above mentioned, on or before January 1, 1907, copies of all treaties and agreements and a complete record of all transactions of every character between the United States and the said Mexican Kickapoo Indians of Oklahoma and all acts of the United States, or its officials, relating to the said Indians or their affairs or interests.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, that amendment, which I see the Senator has drawn with great care, provides for putting into the Court of Claims this claim with respect to which there was a provision in the bill to pay $215,000 to the Mexican Kickapoo Indians, who have gone to reside in another jurisdiction and whom the Department is anxious to have removed from our jurisdiction and from our legislation. Senators yesterday criticised the Department because it did not do more to separate these Indians from our charge.

My objection to this claim has already been made by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], and it seems to me it applies just as well to sending it into the court. This is the statement of the Indian Affairs Office:

Former Commissioners Browning and Jones both reported adversely on bills of this character, on the ground that the Indians have been paid everything that they were entitled to receive and that they had no title to the lands for which it is now proposed to pay them the second time, and that this would be the third time the Government has paid for the land, as it bought said land in the first place from the Creeks for 30 cents an acre.

The Government bought the land from the Creeks and paid them 30 cents an acre. They bought it from the Kickapoos and paid them 32½ cents an acre. Now it is proposed to pay to the Mexican Kickapoos the balance of what the Government got from the sale of the lands, to which the office says they had no title in any event.

Each Commisisoner took the ground that it was not a proper thing to do.

Where we owe the Indians money we ought to pay it to them, but when we pay these large sums of money over to Indians I am afraid the amount that the Indians get is comparatively small; and where there is such a doubt as the office raises in this case, it seems to me there is no good reason for sending the case to the court. It seems to me that the amendment is subject to the same point of order—that it is general legislation.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, if these Indians did not own the land, there is no danger that there will be a judgment rendered against the Government. This was not a gift to the Kickapoo Indians by the Government of the United States. It was an exchange of land—land in Kansas and other sections of the country. If the Senator from Massachusetts can show that the amendment is not sufficiently guarded, of course he might then object. Under it the Government will have its day in court, and if there is no just claim the Government will not pay anything. I am satisfied there is a claim which ought to be paid, and I believe the court will so hold. I do not think anybody ought to object to the Government of the United States, under conditions of this kind, being brought into court to determine that question; and that is all there is of it.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado. Without objection, it is agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. On page 64, line 11, I move to strike out "six" and insert "ten."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota proposes an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. In line 11, page 64, strike out "six," before "thousand," and insert "ten."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. In line 12, same page, I move to strike out "two" and insert "four."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. In line 15 I move to strike out "$49,175" and insert "$55,175."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the words "forty-nine thousand one hundred and seventy-five dollars" and to insert in lieu thereof "fifty-five thousand one hundred and seventy-five dollars."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will regard the committee amendment which was agreed to as open to amendment; the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota is agreed to in the absence of objection, and the amendment as amended is agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the vote by which the amendment relating to clerks, on pages 43 and 44, was agreed to may be reconsidered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the vote by which the committee amendment on page——

Mr. LODGE. Has that been reserved?

Mr. KEAN. I thought it was reserved.

Mr. CLAPP. No, sir; it was accepted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has been agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. Notice with respect to it was given yesterday by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. LODGE. Yes. I ask that it be reconsidered. Of course I can make the point of order I am about to make in the Senate, but it will save time to do it now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The committee amendment is to strike out lines 9 to 21, inclusive, on page 43, and to insert, beginning in line 22, on page 43, the following:

Provided, That hereafter clerks and deputy clerks of United States courts in the Indian Territory who are ex officio recorders of recording districts in said Territory shall be allowed, out of the fees received for the recording and filing of instruments, 25 per cent in addition to the sum for compensation and actual expenses for clerk hire now provided by law.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment was agreed to? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of order that it is general legislation; that it makes a charge on the United States Treasury; that it is not estimated for, and that it alters existing law which fixes the salaries. In fact, the amendment refers to the existing law.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that the objection is fatal to the amendment. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CARTER. If committee amendments have been disposed of, I move to amend, on page 74——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The committee amendments are not all disposed of. The Secretary will report the next passed-over committee amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 73, after line 15, it is proposed to insert a committee amendment, "Blackfeet Reservation," which was read.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Minnesota permit me to offer an amendment?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. TILLMAN. I move to insert, on page 44, at the end of line 16, a new paragraph. It is an amendment, I will explain, of the bill which passed the Senate a week or two ago, about the Five Civilized Tribes, settling their business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the proposed amendment an amendment to a committee amendment, or is it an independent proposition?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is an amendment to the bill which passed the Senate about two weeks ago and is now in limbo somewhere because of a mistake in enrollment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest that the Senator withdraw his amendment, if it is an additional proposition, until the committee amendments shall have been disposed of.

Mr. CLAPP. The Chair misunderstood the Senator. It is not an amendment to any amendment in the bill. It is a new item proposed to be inserted in the bill.

Mr. TELLER. A new paragraph.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands, and after the committee amendments shall have been disposed of, independent amendments will be considered. The amendment beginning on page 73 has been read and passed over. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. The next committee amendment passed over is the amendment beginning after line 24, on page 19, which will be stated. If the Chair is not mistaken, this amendment was passed over at the request of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out, after line 24 on page 19, the following:

The appropriations for the salaries of Indian agents shall not take effect nor become available in any case for or during the time in which any officer of the Army of the United States shall be engaged in the performance of the duties of Indian agent at any of the agencies above named; and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, may devolve the duties of any Indian agency or part thereof upon the superintendent of the Indian school located at such agency or part thereof whenever in his judgment such superintendent can properly perform the duties of such agency. And the superintendent upon whom such duties devolve shall give bond as other Indian agents.

And to insert:

That no Army officer shall be engaged in the performance of the duties of Indian agent.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I was told that while I was speaking to the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] the long Blackfeet Reservation amendment was suddenly agreed to. I was not aware that it was even up. My attention was engaged with the Senator from Montana, who desires to amend it. I would desire to amend it if he did not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that the Senate dispose of the amendment just reported to the Senate, and then afterwards recur to the amendment to which the Senator from Massachusetts has directed attention.

Mr. LODGE. The amendment that is now before the Senate will take some time, and I fancy the Senator from Montana can dispose of his amendment in a few moments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Chair will regard the amendment to which the Senator from Massachusetts refers as still an open question.

Mr. CARTER. On page 74 of the bill, line 2, after the word "Montana," I move to strike out down to and including the word "purpose," in line 8, on the same page.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana proposes an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. After the word "Montana," in line 2, page 74, it is proposed to strike out the following:

And all proceedings in any pending suit commenced by the United States praying for an injunction to enjoin the use of the waters of any such stream shall be suspended, and no like suit shall hereafter be commenced or prosecuted by the United States against any person or company actually using the water of any of the streams aforesaid for a beneficial purpose.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, this portion of the bill was inserted for the purpose of meeting a peculiar, indeed, an extraordinary condition of affairs. In 1898 a number of citizens of the northern portion of Montana undertook the construction of an irrigating canal to divert water from a stream known as "Birch Creek." That stream forms the southeastern boundary of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation. The association operated under the name, I believe, of the Conrad Investment Company. Pursuant to provisions of general law, this company, desiring to construct the canal, proceeded to file in the office of the Secretary of the Interior the maps and plats and descriptive matter necessary to secure a right of way over the public domain for the canal and works it contemplated constructing. These plans included a dam in Birch Creek, intended to divert the waters thereof into the canal.

The center of Birch Creek is the southeast boundary line of the Blackfeet Reservation. The Secretary of the Interior, in October, 1898, regularly approved the plat, map, and descriptive matter accompanying the same, including the diversion dam proposed to be constructed across the boundary stream—Birch Creek. Having thus procured what seemed——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CARTER. I yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. Has the Senator that approval? Has he any documentary evidence of it?

Mr. CARTER. The documentary evidence is not in my possession. I have, however, a description of the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, which is the only document in the case, written under date, I believe, of October 19, 1898—letter "F."

Mr. TILLMAN. Have you that document here?

Mr. CARTER. The document itself is not in my possession.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have here a statement from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated April 17, 1906, from which it appears, as the Department states—

Thus far, in looking back I find no record of an approval by the Department of the Conrad dam.

If such a document is in existence it ought to be easily accessible, and I should think the Senator would be able to get it very readily.

Mr. CARTER. I have no doubt it can be readily procured. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs advised me last Saturday that he had not found the document. I referred him at that time to the date and the letter by which this communication can be identified.

Mr. TILLMAN. He goes on to say:

If anything resembling one was ever given, it must have been under a total misapprehension of the situation.

Mr. CARTER. That is, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes. He proceeds:

I do find abundant record of the adverse attitude of the Department toward the dam project, and a strong recommendation of summary and rather violent measures made by the late United States Indian agent for the Blackfeet Indians. The Office, however, sought to avoid all drastic reprisals, and to obtain mere justice for the Indians, by resorting to the courts. It has never desired to deprive any white settler of water to irrigate his lands, but has aimed merely to establish by judicial decree the rights of all parties, and then to see to it that no more water was taken for the reservation than actually needed for the legitimate agricultural operations therein—the rest to flow on undisturbed.

Hastily, yours,

FRANCIS E. LEUPP, Commissioner.

Mr. CARTER. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs has nothing whatever to do with the record to which I refer, and he had no knowledge of it on Saturday last.

Mr. TILLMAN. I stated that he said he had not been able, in looking back, to find any documents which would warrant the statement made by the Senator now, that the dam project was approved.

Mr. CARTER. There is no document in the Indian Office. It is in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, and is in the form of a copy of a letter of approval dated the 19th day of October, 1898. That is all the document there is in the transaction.

But, Mr. President, in view of the motion I have made, I desire to proceed with the explanation. Having secured the approval of the Department, the company proceeded to construct the canal, investing over $400,000 in the work, and to-day it is said on good authority that over 300 families are dependent upon the waters of Birch Creek for their very existence as farmers.

After the settlers had come into the country and established their homes they proceeded in many cases to acquire title under the homestead and desert-land laws. Since 1898 many of these entrymen have made final proof, showing compliance with the law, and where they have taken up land under the desert-land act they have shown that the source of water supply was the identical canal in question.

In 1905, some six or seven years after the canal right of way had been approved by the Interior Department, and many years after it had been constructed, after the settlers had cast their lot upon land below the canal, from which their claims could be irrigated and made productive, the Government of the United States commenced a suit to enjoin these people from longer maintaining the dam in Birch Creek, which they had constructed under Government approval. If the owners of the land on the north side where the dam is located happened to be private persons, these settlers would have ample remedy, because under the constitution of the State of Montana, the portion applicable to which I will read, they would have the right to condemn for the uses of the dam the necessary land upon which it stood and the land necessary for its maintenance. Section 15 of article 3 of the constitution of Montana reads as follows:

The use of all water now appropriated or that may hereafter be appropriated for sale, rental, distribution, or other beneficial use, and the right of way over the lands of others for all ditches, drains, dams, canals, and aqueducts necessary to be used in connection therewith, as well as the site for reservoirs necessary for collecting and storing the same, shall be held to be a public use.

Statutes were passed giving this clause of our constitution due effect. Therefore, I say if the land on the north side of Birch Creek had been in private ownership, this suit could not have been for an instant maintained, but, on the contrary, the party owning the dam could proceed to condemn the dam site for a public use. But the title to the land north of Birch Creek was in the sovereign, in the United States, and the people who had built the dam under the authority of the United States were powerless to begin a suit for condemnation, because the title was in the United States. Water was appropriated and was being used under authority of a section of the Revised Statutes of the United States enacted into law, I believe, in 1866, which I send to the Secretary's desk to be read.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understood him to say a moment ago that the Blackfeet Reservation belongs to the sovereign, the United States.

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to ask the Senator whether it is not under a treaty stipulation with the Blackfeet Indians that that reservation belongs to the Indians, and would it not take an act of Congress rather than an order of the Secretary of the Interior to change the legal status?

Mr. CARTER. I think the adjudicated cases establish the law beyond any further question or doubt that the Indians on this continent were regarded by the Europeans who came here and by the Government of the United States, from the time of its establishment, as only enjoying a possessory right. The right in fee simple has never been recognized in the Indian tribes. As a matter of law, Congress has a right to dispose of Indian lands according to its own best judgment. The habit has grown up of consulting the Indians and looking to their welfare as viewed by themselves, but time and again Congress has proceeded without any treaty or previous arrangement to open reservations, to dispose of the lands by allotment, and to open the remainder thereof to public settlement.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator did not answer my question, or I did not make myself understood. I asked him whether it would not require an act of Congress to change the title held by the Blackfeet Indians?

Mr. CARTER. Not at all. Their possessory right is subject to action by Congress. They have no title to the fee.

Mr. TILLMAN. I thought the Senator just said that in effect by declaring that Congress could do anything it pleases, which I recognize to be the legal situation.

Mr. CARTER. I think Congress could, without consulting the Indians—I do not think by an Executive order—dispossess the Indians there, because they are in possession by and in virtue of a treaty made by the executive department and ratified by Congress.

Mr. TILLMAN. The land on the south side of the creek from which the dam was built to the north side of the creek abuted on Government land without authority from Congress to so abut, and therefore it was unlawful to construct it.

Mr. CARTER. The difficulty with the dam was in legal contemplation not as to the portion resting on the public domain; that is, south of the center of the stream. Concerning that portion no question of legality is raised. The Secretary approved the dam, which reached to the northern bank of the stream beyond the Indian line, which rested in the center, and as to that portion north of the south line of the Indian reservation I am prepared to concede that the Government prosecuting a suit could abate this dam as a nuisance or enjoin the people from using it to divert water. As I said, that is the great difficulty in connection with this whole matter. The south half of the dam is there legally, while the north half is without legal status, because only that the Secretary's approval did not and could not impair the possessory right of the Indians to the land on which the north half of the dam rests.

Mr. TILLMAN. As I understand the Senator, the purpose of this amendment is to have the rights of the Indians settled by an act of Congress rather than by the courts.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator will perceive the fact that the bill, of which this is a part, contemplates throwing this entire Indian reservation open to settlement. Within the period of not over three years all the preliminary work of opening the reservation will have been accomplished and the land upon which this dam rests will be a part of the public domain from the south to the north bank. Thereupon the laws of the State of Montana will be applicable and the suit in question can no longer be maintained.

The objection to the prosecution of the suit rests in this, that without any purpose to be served in this world except to establish an abstract right, the suit for an injunction, if prosecuted to prevent these hundreds of settlers from taking water out of that stream, will if successful deprive them of their property values and the water would then flow unchecked to the Gulf of Mexico, while the settlers would be reduced to destitution in many if not in all cases.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. As I understand the situation, this dam is owned by a man named Conrad, or a company of which Mr. Conrad is the principal stockholder—something like that.

Mr. CARTER. It is a water company owned by all the people who have shares purchased for the purpose of representing their respective lands.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is called the "Conrad dam." It was built by the Conrad company, or by Conrad himself. Is that true?

Mr. CARTER. I think by a company.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, then, if I understand the situation, and I have some report here from the Indian Commissioner, the dam having stopped the water of Birch Creek, the canal carries water out to the white settlers who have bought water rights from Conrad, and I understand from some one—I think the Senator himself said that these white settlers have paid Conrad $5 per acre for every acre of land that was irrigated from his ditch. Therefore Conrad has a very nice return for the capital invested, which depends on the continuance of the use of the water by these renters of water.

Mr. CARTER. The $5 per acre is about one-third of the cost of furnishing the water. The Government furnishes water under similar circumstances under the irrigation act at $30 per acre.

Mr. TILLMAN. We are not discussing that. We are merely discussing the rights of these Indians to some of the water which washes the bank of their reservation, and I think probably it would be well right here to have the Secretary read the accompanying papers with the letter of which I read a part a moment ago, so as to get the whole in the RECORD together, and let the Commissioner of Indian Affairs state his side or the Department's side of this controversy.

Mr. CARTER. I will be glad if the Senator will withhold that extensive document. My statement will not be as long as the document.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course, but I thought I would get it in now in connection with what I just said. However, if the Senator desires me to withhold it I will do so.

Mr. CARTER. I think the Senator will perceive that his effort to be heard in this matter will, in the light of my statement, be entirely unnecessary. An understanding has been reached with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, which I will state in the course of a few minutes, and the encumbering of the RECORD with the interjection of this statement at this time would be deemed unnecessary by the Commissioner, if he were here present.

Mr. TILLMAN. Has the Senator got that in writing?

Mr. CARTER. I think the Senator may be capable of understanding what I say. If not, I will repeat it and make it more lucid from time to time.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course. I thought probably the Senator had already reached some agreement in writing, and had it here and could put it in. The Senator is a very able lawyer, and he can state any legal proposition with perfect satisfaction to anyone. I can understand his statement of it if he has not got it. I thought he had it.

Mr. CARTER. I esteem that certificate of character very highly, and I will proceed.

Now, Mr. President, as before stated, had this land on the north side of the stream been in private ownership, these parties could have condemned and obtained absolute right to the site of the dam. This suit having been commenced and being prosecuted to obtain a permanent injunction restraining the settlers from taking the water out of the stream, left the settlers absolutely without remedy, because I am perfectly free to venture the opinion that the Government would unquestionably succeed. It would succeed in obtaining an injunction which would ruin a community without any possible benefit to the Indians as a net result.

I am advised that the total acreage cultivated in the Indian country on the north shore of that stream is 40 acres of land.

Mr. NELSON. By an Indian?

Mr. CARTER. By an Indian, and that Indian is a white man, an individual we call a "squaw man." The settlers along the north bank of the river or stream are, I believe, all squaw men. There are only four or five of them. Only two of them take water from the stream. Below this diversion dam, and above the head of any of the ditches or diversion canals of these squaw men, the stream is fortified by springs and other sources of supply, so that they all have ample water. Under these circumstances it seemed to me that the pressing forward of this suit to secure an injunction which would only settle a mere abstract question of right constituted an assertion of right and power for no useful purpose.

Imbued with this idea, after being advised that the suit would be pressed and realizing that the injunction could only be operative during the time the Indian reservation continued to exist, and knowing that this bill would cause that reservation to become public land in the near future, I felt the suit should be suspended to the end that this settlement might be saved from useless, needless, and ruthless destruction.

I could not conceive, and I can not now conceive, what purpose the Indians could have subserved, what purpose the United States Government could have in view in tearing the dam out of the stream and allowing the waters of that stream to run down to the Gulf of Mexico, while the homes of these people were permitted to suffer and perish in consequence. I felt that the situation demanded some drastic measure, and, in conjunction with my colleague, suggested this language in the bill which would suspend that suit and prevent the institution of like suits in the future. I fully understood, and I sympathize with the commendable desire of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to protect Indian rights, to settle, as he says, all disputed questions; but the assertion of a naked right, which assertion can be in no sense beneficial to the Government, the assertion whereof will bring ruin and destruction to homes, I care not how many, it may be one or a dozen or fifty or three hundred, seemed to me to require some check.

Since this amendment was introduced and printed it has been my privilege to have a conference with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the President concerning this matter. There is no serious dispute about the facts. The question arises as to the number of Indians who use the water on the north side. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs is to ascertain what water these Indians need on the north side. They are to be allowed all the water they do need. There is no conflict between the settlers and the Indians. All the water the Indians can use, or need to use, will go unrestrained over this dam, and, in the meantime, I have the assurance that this suit will not be pressed forward to the extent of in any manner or form oppressing these settlers.

That is the only purpose in introducing the amendment. The amendment was somewhat drastic and unusual. I have no desire to press it since the executive department of the Government will grant the relief we here seek through the legislative enactment. In consequence of this view, Mr. President, I made the motion to strike out that portion of the bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I dislike to have the appearance of meddling with the local conditions in Montana, but this matter was called to my attention by a private letter from a resident of that part of the country, and it appeared to me that it was queer that Congress should be called on to suppress lawsuits by an act when those lawsuits had been begun by the agents of the Government in their official capacities to try to protect the rights of the wards of the Government—the Indians. To throw a little more light upon it, I would ask that the statement which was sent to me and which I sent to the desk a few moments ago be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would ask whether the Senator from South Carolina desires to have the letter of the Commissioner read?

Mr. TILLMAN. No; I care nothing about having the letter read. I have already read most of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read, as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Page 73, line 16, to page 84, line 20: This provides for the survey of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians thereof, and disposal of the surplus lands. In the main it follows the lines of a bill prepared in this Office and submitted to the Department on March 24, 1906. One or two of the changes made, however, call for strong disapproval. For example, on page 73, lines 9 to 18, is a provision which makes all water rights and privileges connected with the streams within or adjoining the reservation subject to the laws of Montana, and dismisses any pending suit begun by the Government for the purpose of protecting the rights of the Indians and makes it forever impossible for any action to be taken by the United States as trustee or guardian of the allottees to protect their water rights.

To understand the effect of this legislation, it is necessary to know something about the history of the litigation which has been undertaken in the State of Montana for the purpose of protecting the rights of the Indians. A suit is now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States concerning the rights to the water of the Milk River in Montana by the Indians of the Fort Belknap Reservation.

There is no controversy over the facts in the case, the only point at issue being the law applicable. It is admitted that the water users above the reservation last summer took every bit of the water from the river so that none came down as far as the reservation, thus depriving the Indians not only of water for irrigation but also for domestic purposes; and all this notwithstanding the fact that the Government had expended about $100,000 of treaty funds belonging to the Indians in the construction of an irrigation system.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, it is important to remember that this relates to another reservation and to an entirely different matter.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading, as follows:

Prior to the decision of this suit by the district court and the circuit court of appeals an irrigation company diverted the waters of the Birch Creek—which is a boundary stream of the Blackfeet Reservation—and it is alleged took all the water from that stream, depriving the Indians below the dam of water from the creek. Instead of taking summary action, the Office peacefully carried the matter into the courts, where it is now pending.

There is considerable conflict in the statements made to the Office as to the effect of the canal company's operations and the number of Indians who are affected thereby. It is believed that this is a question which should be determined by the courts after hearing the evidence and examining the witnesses. Moreover, the company is still using the water and has been, although the suit has been pending for several months, and probably will continue to use the water until a temporary injunction is issued, and perhaps until a final decree is entered.

The company, fearful of the effect of the decision in the Milk River case, has tried by every means possible to have the suit against it dismissed. Failing, in other words, it would now have Congress direct the dismissal of the suit in which are involved the rights of helpless persons whom it is the duty of the Government to protect.

Such a proceeding is not only unjust to the Indians, but is a reflection on the court before which the suit is pending, and, in fact, on the whole Federal judiciary, for the case is of such a nature that it can be carried to the Supreme Court for final adjudication. If this were a suit between white persons, one claiming under a Federal law or grant, such as the Indians have, such an unusual proceeding would stir up adverse popular sentiment all over the country, and I can not understand why any distinction should be made between an Indian and a white man in such a matter.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, Mr. President, if I am not mistaken, the situation is about as I shall state it. The Conrad dam practically takes all the water out of Birch Creek, and the Indians on the north bank who are to have their lands allotted to them now will be deprived for all time to come, under the laws of Montana, of getting any water, because I understood from the Senator who is advocating this measure that under the laws of Montana the first man who gets the water has the right to continue to keep it, to hold it, and to use it. Is that true?

Mr. CARTER. The general principle of the law of Montana and of the arid-land States is that the person first in time is first in right, and this right continues as long as the water is applied to useful purposes, such as are contemplated by the law.

Mr. TILLMAN. That corroborates what I understand to be the situation. The Conrad dam having taken all the water, and it already being used, doubtless necessary and a valuable asset, by the white settlers, renters who have leased water rights from Conrad, the Indians who are now to be given their homes will never be able to get any water, because Conrad's prior right will be settled by the law of Montana, and no suit can be instituted by the Department to protect the Indians. The white man gets the water and keeps it, and the Indian never can get any water, except, possibly, the half dozen or dozen "squaw men," as the Senator calls them, who have married Indian women.

If the lawsuit was prosecuted to a termination and the rights of Indians to participate in the use of this water were fixed, then these allotments of lands to Indians would be of some benefit; the allotments would have some value; but otherwise Conrad has got the water in his ditch; he has sold it to white settlers, and the purpose here is to protect the white settlers in the use of it, regardless of the rights of the Indians.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, that statement, of course, is about as near the truth as a Senator not familiar with the facts could make it, but it does not show the facts of the situation. It is needless to take the time to go into a general education of the Senator on the subject. The fact is, as I am informed, that the Conrad dam does not divert all the water; and, furthermore, that there are certain tributary streams entering Birch Creek on the north side below this dam which furnish all the water which the Indians need, and probably an ample supply to irrigate all of the irrigable lands on the bottoms north of the creek. Upon that point, however, I do not venture a definite opinion. I am quite sure that not to exceed 160 acres of land are being irrigated in the Birch Creek bottom north of the stream.

But these details are to be looked into with care. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs is to ascertain what the needs of the Indians are by an investigation, which, fortunately, will be made, as the result of the understanding reached, to which I have referred. There will be no difficulty in the way of doing justice when the truth becomes known through an impartial investigation conducted upon the ground. With full faith in the assurances I have received that an investigation will be made, and that the pending suit will not be needlessly pressed to the injury of the settlers, I have offered the amendment, which will be agreed to without doubt.

Mr. TILLMAN. I only wish to say a word additional, to assure the Senator from Montana that I am the last man who would want to oppress the white men up there who have rented water rights from Mr. Conrad.

Mr. CARTER. I am glad to see the Senator from South Carolina taking up the colored man's case so vigorously.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to do justice, if I know what it is, regardless of whether a man is white or black or red or yellow.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I am satisfied now that if the Senator from South Carolina would take a trip over that section of country, and view the situation, as it is known to my colleague [Mr. CLARK] and myself, he would certainly insist that this suit, which will work injury without resulting benefit to any of the parties to it, should be discontinued. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana what was the inspiration of this suit? Why was it brought?

Mr. CARTER. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs says that he desired to settle, and now desires to settle, in the courts, as rapidly as he can, all disputed questions involving Indian rights; and in pursuance of that policy this injunction was sought.

Mr. SPOONER. How long has the suit been pending?

Mr. CARTER. It was commenced last year. For seven years, I think, these people have been establishing homes and building dams.

Mr. CLARK of Montana. Mr. President, I think there is considerable misapprehension in the minds of Senators here generally who are not familiar with that country, about the conditions existing on the Blackfeet Reservation. The southern boundary of that reservation, which is a very large one, comprising several million acres of land, is a creek called Birch Creek, upon which the dam, which has been referred to, was made and from which the water has been diverted. Birch Creek is simply one of probably a hundred creeks which rise farther to the north out of the great Rocky Mountain Range, and is one of the great number of streams which water that immense area comprising the Blackfeet Reservation. While it is an important stream, the drainage from the reservation is inconsiderable. It drains a portion of the southern boundary of the reservation, which contains very little irrigable land. To-day, and for years past, as I have been informed by Mr. M. D. Baldwin, who was for several years the agent of the Blackfeet Indians, and who resided there and is familiar with every portion of the reservation, there are and have been no residents who will be deprived of their rights or who might be deprived of their rights, except about three, one called Dog Face, another Titse, and another Squaw Man. Not one of these men has ever cultivated an acre of land. It is true they have used this water for domestic purposes, but there is plenty of water available, not only for domestic purposes, but for the irrigation of much more land than exists there, by taking out a ditch from this stream higher up. There was a ditch taken out by the Government some years ago, a little higher up, but they never even put a dam in it, and it was a waste of money.

I repeat, that we deprive nobody of any rights by diverting the water from Birch Creek, but we do subserve the interests of several hundred intelligent, industrious American citizens, who have gone there in good faith on that great plateau of land of the most fertile character, but which can not be cultivated without water, lying to the eastward, and which is served by the ditch of the company called the Conrad Investment Company.

Now, so far as taking water from the Indians is concerned, or allowing the laws of the United States to operate there, they can protect themselves, and the Government will see to it that they are protected before the allotments are made, and the whites are allowed to make entries. No white man can initiate a title to either land or a water right until the reservation is thrown open. The Indians, of which there are about 2,000, inhabit the country watered by the streams which lie to the north of Birch Creek. The Government will see that they are protected by the law which obtains in the State of Montana and generally throughout the country—the law of priority of appropriation, and before title can be obtained to one acre of that land by white settlers, the Indians will have been protected by taking up such water rights as will be necessary, and perhaps more than necessary, to irrigate all the land which they may obtain by allotment.

In 1897 the Conrad Investment Company was formed and the maps of the location of the dam and ditches were filed, as has been stated—and I believe correctly—with the Department of the Interior. Advertisements were made throughout the State as to the intention of this company to divert the water of Birch Creek out to those great areas of land lying to the eastward, which were arid without it. Contracts were let for the construction of the ditch, and several hundred thousand dollars were expended by that company. The Indians had notice, the Government of the United States had notice, everybody interested had notice, of the great improvement that was undertaken there, and I can see no reason why the Government, the Indians, and everybody else concerned ought not to be estopped from taking any legal action to-day.

A dam was put in there, the northern portion of which abutted against lands belonging to the Indians, or, as has been since suggested here, which more properly belong to the United States, which I believe the Wolf-Lodge decision by the Supreme Court of the United States has established beyond doubt. A large ditch was constructed to the eastward for a distance of about 100 miles, and reservoirs for water storage were built, and, taking the lateral ditches into consideration, there is a system of at least 200 miles in extent. The promoters of that great enterprise, as well as the people of Montana generally, sought to offer every inducement to prevent settlers from going, as they are by tens of thousands, over into Canada, and very liberal arrangements were effected with this investment company for the use of water as compared with the rates charged under the reclamation law. Several hundred of them went in there and filed upon the land. They made their entries; they began the cultivation of the land; their entries were filed in the land office and have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior. In a great many instances they have paid their money for them, and to-day they own the land. I have a list here of thirty-three settlers who have proved up upon their land. In so proving up it was necessary that they should show to the satisfaction of the Interior Department that they had made arrangements for a water supply. I have here a list of the improvements that were shown or were established by the Secretary of the Interior by these thirty-three settlers, and I have no doubt there are many others of which I have no account. They invested all the way from five or six hundred dollars to $4,000 each in the way of improvements, and the aggregate amounts to more than $50,000; and this comprises only a part of those home builders.

I am not speaking for any water company or any investment company, but my voice is raised here to-day in behalf of several hundred industrious American farmers and stock raisers who, acting in good faith, have been misled by the action of the Government into proving their titles and paying for the land; and now if this injunction suit, which has been filed, is not held in suspense until the reservation is thrown open and the right to the water is confirmed, these people will be absolutely ruined. They are now awaiting the action of Congress before they begin plowing.

So I concur with my colleague [Mr. CARTER] that this amendment, which was supposed to be about the only remedy we had and which may seem, perhaps, to many of you to be a little drastic, shall go out, so that no further controversy may be had upon the subject. We do that with the assurance, implied and expressed, by those in authority that they have no desire or intention of pressing legal action to the detriment of these settlers pending the opening of the reservation. Relying upon this assurance, relying upon the sense of honesty and fairness of the officials of the Government, I am willing that that objectionable feature of this bill may be eliminated; but I contend that the clause relating to the operation of the law of the United States governing water titles and water rights shall remain, and I can assure Senators that no injustice will be done to the Indians.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to line 7, page 75. I move that the amendment of the committee be amended by inserting after the word "Interior," in line 7, page 75, the words "or otherwise disposed of."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 75, line 7, after the word "Interior," it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by inserting the words "or otherwise disposed of;" so as to read:

That upon the completion of said allotments, the President of the United States shall appoint a commission consisting of three persons to inspect, appraise, and value all of the said lands that shall not have been allotted in severalty to said Indians or reserved by the Secretary of the Interior, or otherwise disposed of; said commission to be constituted as follows: One commissioner shall be a person holding tribal relations with said Indians, and the other two resident citizens of the State of Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. DICK. With the permission of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the two amendments already agreed to, after line 6 on page 50, it is proposed to insert the following:

That the following described area in the Indian Territory shall constitute a new recording district, No. 30:

Beginning where the west line of range 24 east intersects the north line of said Territory; thence south to the south bank of the Neosho River; thence westerly along said south bank to the west line of section 26, township 27, range 23; thence south to south line of said township; thence west to west line of range 22; thence south a distance of 15 miles; thence east to east line of said Territory; thence north to north line thereof; thence west to beginning. And the courts for said district shall be held in the town of Wyandotte, and all laws applicable to and regulating the courts of the Indian Territory shall be applicable to the courts hereby created.

That the north half of township 23, in ranges 18, 19, 20, and 21, is hereby annexed to recording district No. 2.

That township 29, in ranges 18, 19, 20, and 21; township 28, in ranges 19, 20, 21, and 22; township 27, in ranges 21, 22, and 23 (except where herein attached to district No. 30), are hereby attached to recording district No. 1.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment which was passed over.

The SECRETARY. On page 19, under the subhead "Indian agents—Proviso," line 24, the committee proposed to strike out:

The appropriations for the salaries of Indian agents shall not take effect nor become available in any case for or during the time in which any officer of the Army of the United States shall be engaged in the performance of the duties of Indian agent at any of the agencies above named; and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, may devolve the duties of any Indian agency or part thereof upon the superintendent of the Indian school located at such agency or part thereof whenever in his judgment such superintendent can properly perform the duties of such agency. And the superintendent upon whom such duties devolve shall give bond as other Indian agents.

And to insert:

That no Army officer shall be engaged in the performance of the duties of Indian agent.

Mr. KEAN. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is somewhat interested in that amendment. He made a point of order on it. I have sent for the Senator.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, of course this is a subject that has been before the Senate for a good many years. When this policy was first inaugurated there was very decided objection to Army officers being detailed as Indian agents, this objection coming almost unanimously from representatives of the sections of the country where Indian reservations are located.

Experience has demonstrated, I think, that Army officers do not perform these duties as well as civilians. That is shown by the fact that fewer Army officers are appointed year by year, until now there are only two or three left in the service. The contention has always been by those who live in the Indian country that the best agents are those selected from the immediate neighborhood of the reservations, and the policy is now almost settled that the Indian agents should be appointed from among the citizens in the vicinity of the reservations. They will live in that country after their terms expire; they want to stand well with their neighbors; they understand the Indians, and they perform the service better than any other class of citizens. I think, and the committee thought, and I believe the committee has been of the opinion for several years, that Army officers should not be designated for these appointments.

I am not a good parliamentarian—I do not profess to be—but I hardly think a point of order ought to lie against this amendment, or can lie against it. We are providing for salaries. It is the same as providing for the salaries of Indian agents, in a measure, I should think, and, it occurs to me, it is legislation that comes properly on this appropriation bill.

I do not believe that any good purpose for the Indians or the white people is subserved by the detailing of Army officers to perform the labors of Indian agents. The only reason for pursuing that policy at all was that, at times when the Indians might be turbulent and hard to manage, the discipline of an Army officer in certain cases would be beneficial. That reason may have been good, but the occasion for it has now passed away. I think the point of order is not well taken and does not lie against this amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is no point of order against the pending amendment.

Mr. KEAN. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] made a point of order against it.

Mr. DUBOIS. I beg pardon, then. I thought the Senator from New Jersey made the point of order.

Mr. KEAN. I made no point of order. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts had done so.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood this amendment was passed over, at the request of the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. KEAN. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts desired to make a point of order against it.

Mr. CLAPP. I think, Mr. President, it is the desire of the Senator to make a point of order, and I would not care to press the matter in his absence.

Mr. KEAN. I understood so.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will lie over. The Secretary will state the next amendment which was passed over.

The SECRETARY. On page 53, after line 18, the committee proposed to insert the following:

That the Court of Claims is hereby authorized and directed to hear and adjudicate the claims against the Choctaw Nation of the heirs of Peter P. Pitchlynn, deceased, and of the heirs of Samuel Garland, deceased, and the claim of Chester Howe, his associates and assigns, against the Mississippi Choctaws, and to render judgment thereon in such amounts as may appear to be equitably due. Said judgments, if any, in favor of the heirs of Pitchlynn, and the heirs of Garland, aforesaid, shall be paid out of any funds in the Treasury of the United States belonging to the Choctaw Nation, and said judgment, if any, in favor of Chester Howe, his associates or assigns aforesaid, shall be paid out of any funds due or to become due the defendants in said suit, said judgment to be rendered on the principal of quantum meruit for services rendered and expenses incurred under contracts with the defendants. Notice of said suit shall be served on the governor of the Choctaw Nation, and the Attorney-General of the United States shall appear and defend in said suit on behalf of said nation and said Mississippi Choctaws.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CLAPP. In justice to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], I ought to state that that amendment was objected to by him.

Mr. HALE. I suggest to the Senator that, in the absence of the senior Senator from Iowa, this amendment be passed over for the present.

Mr. CLAPP. That is satisfactory.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. All other committee amendments have been agreed to. What is the further pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. SPOONER. No; they have not been, unless by inadvertence.

Mr. CLAPP. The amendment on page 7 has not been agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. I am advised that my colleague is in favor of this amendment, and I do not wish to take it up in his absence.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This morning, on motion of the senior Senator from Wisconsin, the vote by which the amendment on pages 7 and 8 was adopted was reconsidered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not wish to take it up in the absence of my colleague, who, I am informed, is interested in it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be passed over at the request of the senior Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. CLAPP. I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment on page 19, passed over on account of his absence.

Mr. LODGE. I do not know about the portion stricken from the bill, but what I objected to is the clause that is added:

That no Army officer shall be engaged in the performance of the duties of Indian agent.

That, I think, is subject to the point of order that it is general legislation. It changes existing law and is general legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts understand that the committee amendment is an amendment to strike out and insert?

Mr. LODGE. I suppose it is to strike out and insert.

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. But that does not make it in order. I would make the point of order against the inserting clause about Army officers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. An amendment to strike out and insert is indivisible. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CLAPP. I move to strike out the House provision. I do so because the Department has advised that it is necessary to make some change in it, and striking it out will make it the subject of conference.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 19, it is proposed to strike out line 25 and all of the bill down to line 12 on page 20.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. In the absence of the Senator who favored the amendments on pages 7 and 8, I feel, much as I dislike to delay the consideration of the bill, without being able to ascertain whether his absence is due to illness or other unavoidable circumstances, that the bill should be passed over for the day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from Minnesota, the pending bill will be laid aside for the day.

APPROPRIATION FOR MARE ISLAND NAVY-YARD, CAL., ETC.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I herewith inclose communications from the Navy Department and the War Department in reference to communications from Mayor Schmitz, of San Francisco, and from other representatives of California. With a courage and self-reliance of which we can not as Americans be sufficiently proud, the people of San Francisco have already started in orderly and resolute fashion to rebuild the city. Immediate aid in this enterprise should be given by the Federal Government. One of the crying needs of the situation is employment for the scores of thousands of men who have lost everything. If the appropriation of $300,000 for the Mare Island Navy-Yard be at once passed, over 2,000 men will immediately be put to work, for this appropriation will be expended only in employing labor. The appropriation is urgently needed as a means of contributing toward the reestablishment of affairs in San Francisco. It will also be of material use to the Navy.

Furthermore, I recommend that the Congress act on the recommendations of the War Department and appropriate the money necessary to establish a building as a general supply and storage depot for the supply departments of the Army and transport service on a part of the military reservation of Fort Mason. This project is set forth in Senate bill 4475 of the present session.

I have requested the Treasury and Post-Office Departments to prepare their estimates for replacing or repairing the other Government buildings in San Francisco. These estimates will be ready in a short while, and will then be laid before you.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 25, 1906.

Mr. PERKINS. I move that the message be printed; that that part of it relating to the Navy be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; that that portion relating to the depot and warehouses, referred to in Senate bill 4475, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, which already have that bill under consideration, and that the remaining portion of the message be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FLINT. In pursuance of the recommendation contained in the message, I introduce a bill appropriating $300,000 for the employment of additional laborers at the Mare Island Navy-Yard, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bill (S. 5872) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to employ additional laborers and mechanics at the navy-yard, Mare Island, Cal., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

AMENDMENT OF THE TRADE-MARK LAW.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Will the Senator from Maine yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I am directed by the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 15911) to amend the laws of the United States relating to the registration of trade-marks, to report it with an amendment, and to ask that it be considered at the present time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Patents with an amendment, in line 18, section 4, page 3, to strike out "upon its passage" and to insert in lieu thereof "July 1, 1906;" so as to read:

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect July 1, 1906.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HALE. I renew the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 26, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate April 25, 1906.

James M. Sloan to be postmaster at Navasota, in the county of Grimes and State of Texas.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 25, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Monday, April 23, 1906, was read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Journal will stand approved.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I shall be compelled to object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on approving the Journal.

The question being taken, the Journal was approved.

RETURN OF A BILL TO THE SENATE.

The SPEAKER. At the adjournment of the House on Monday a motion was pending, submitted by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], to discharge the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries from further consideration of the bill (S. 4886) to simplify the issue of enrollments and licenses of vessels of the United States, and agree to the request of the Senate for the return of the bill. The Chair did not rule upon the motion, but is prepared to do so now.

The Chair has ascertained that the custom of requesting the return of a bill already passed and sent to the other House is very old, beginning as early as 1810 at least.

In 1856 an order making a request of this sort was considered in the House by unanimous consent and not as privileged. Again in 1862 proceedings asking for and granting the return of bills from and to the Senate were journalized as by unanimous consent. So also in 1886, when the fortifications appropriation bill was pending in the House with Senate amendments, on which the previous question had been ordered, the Senate requested its return, and the House granted the request by unanimous consent. In 1896 (sec. 483 of Parliamentary Precedents) a request for the return of a bill to the Senate was laid before the House as privileged; but the actual return was ordered by unanimous consent, as the Journal shows. Again, in 1896, a resolution directing the return of a bill to the Senate was treated as privileged (Parliamentary Precedents, sec. 484), but this was a case where a Senate bill with House amendments disagreed to had been sent to the House and referred to a committee. The resolution which provided for discharging the committee and returning the bill was not offered from the floor as an original proposition, but had been referred to the committee having the bill.

In none of the proceedings referred to did a question of order arise, calling for a formal and well-considered ruling; and even these records of procedure do not justify a motion from the floor to discharge the committee from the consideration of the Senate bill on which the two Houses have not reached the stage of disagreement. While it seems to the Chair desirable that the two Houses should maintain conditions of courtesy respecting the requests of the one upon the other, yet the Chair hesitates to make by a formal ruling motions privileged which are not made privileged by the rule, and this reluctance is increased by the fact that requests of this nature may be granted with a reasonable degree of celerity in the regular order by referring the Senate request to the committee having the bill, leaving that committee to report the bill with the recommendation that it be returned to the Senate. The bill will then go to the Calendar, where it may be reached and acted on in regular order, or by suspension of the rules out of the regular order. Of course in a case where an error was alleged, thereby bringing into question the integrity of the proceedings of the House or the Senate as to a bill, a different principle might prevail.

The Chair directs that the request of the Senate be referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

RICHARD HUDSON.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the request of Mr. MANN to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Richard Hudson, no adverse report having been made thereon.

The question was taken; and the request was granted.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the request of Mr. GRONNA for indefinite leave of absence, on account of sickness.

The question being taken, leave was granted.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 18537). Pending that, I would like to make some arrangement with the other side in regard to general debate, and I will suggest that general debate be closed to-morrow afternoon at half past 5, the time to be equally divided between the two sides. I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

Mr. LAMB. All right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the debate be closed at that time.

The SPEAKER. That motion would not be in order until general debate had been had. The gentleman, at half past 5 to-morrow, or at any other time that he sees proper, can test the sense of the House on closing debate after general debate has been had.

The first motion of Mr. WADSWORTH was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill, with Mr. FOSTER of Vermont in the chair.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to take any time in general debate. I will simply ask that the report of the committee be read. It is short and covers all the items in the bill.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Agriculture, having had under consideration the estimates of appropriations required for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, respectfully submit the accompanying bill (H. R. 18537) and report as follows:

The amount appropriated by this bill for the ordinary and regular routine work of the Department of Agriculture is $6,880,300. The amount carried by the act for the current year is $6,692,690, showing a net increase of $187,610.

The committee has also added "emergency" or "temporary" appropriations amounting to $320,000 for the purposes of further combating the cotton, boll weevil in the cotton States, the gipsy and brown-tail moths in some of the New England States, and the Texas cattle-fever tick in the South.

The total amount carried by this bill is, therefore, $7,200,300.

The committee has held extended and exhaustive hearings and has given very careful consideration to the preparation of the bill, and although the estimates have not in all cases been allowed, the amounts recommended for the several bureaus will be ample to satisfactorily perform all the work which should be properly imposed upon them, always keeping in view a judicious and businesslike expenditure of their moneys.

The following table shows the annual increases in expenditures by the Department of Agriculture during the last nine years:

For 1897–98 the appropriation was	$3,182,902
For 1898–99 it was $3,509,202, an increase of	326,300
For 1899–1900 it was $3,726,022, an increase of	216,820
For 1900–1901 it was $4,023,500, an increase of	297,478
For 1901–2 it was $4,582,420, an increase of	558,920
For 1902–3 it was $5,208,960, an increase of	626,540
For 1903–4 it was $5,478,160 (exclusive of $500,000 for the foot-and-mouth disease emergency), an increase of	269,200
For 1904–5 it was $5,902,040, an increase of	423,880
For 1905–6 it was $6,692,690 (exclusive of $190,000 for the cotton boll weevil emergency), an increase of	790,650
This bill carries $6,880,300 (exclusive of $320,000 for the cotton boll weevil, gipsy and brown-tail moth, and Texas cattle-tick emergencies), an increase of	187,610

It will be observed, therefore, that the total increase in expenditures of the Department during the last nine years (exclusive of the "emergency" appropriations) is $3,697,398, or $514,496 more than double the appropriation of nine years ago.

The Congress has certainly dealt most liberally with the Department of Agriculture.

Actual increases in statutory salaries (amounting in all to $980) have been allowed, as follows:

Office of the Secretary: One painter, from $540 to $720; increase of	$180
Bureau of Plant Industry:
One photographer or clerk, from $720 to $900; increase of	180
One carpenter, $720 to $900; increase of	180
Two plumbers, $720 to $840 each; increase of	240
Division of Publications: Assistant in charge document section, $1,800 to $2,000; increase of	200

As stated above, the actual net increase over the current act is $187,610, and the items going to make up this increase are as follows:

INCREASES.

Office of the Secretary	$180
Weather Bureau	46,090
Bureau of Animal Industry	142,980
Forest Service	124,860
Bureau of Chemistry	3,500
Bureau of Soils	10,000
Bureau of Entomology	1,940
Division of Publications	680
Library	4,840
Experiment stations	33,120
Public roads	10,000
	378,190

DECREASES.

Plant Industry	*$189,680
Bureau of Statistics	900
		190,580
Net increase		187,610

The item covering the Congressional free distribution of vegetable and flower seeds has been entirely omitted from the bill. There is not, and never has been, any warrant of law for this expenditure. The item has simply been tolerated in appropriation bills.

The principle involved in this work is entirely wrong and has never been approved by the Department of Agriculture and has really been a block to other more important lines of investigation.

The original purpose of the organic act, to wit, the distribution of "rare and uncommon seeds, etc.," for experimental purposes through the experiment stations of the several States, has been retained.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take any time in general debate. When the bill is taken up under the five-minute rule I shall be glad to answer any questions which gentlemen may see fit to ask me. I now yield two hours to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand that the time is under the control of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The time is to be equally divided between the gentleman from Virginia and myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that was objected to. The Chair does not understand that there was any agreement as to the control of the time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The limit of time as to general debate was not agreed to, but I understood that the time was to be

* The decrease in the amount allowed the Bureau of Plant Industry is only apparent, as the committee has taken from it the work incident to the distribution of free seeds and has deducted from its appropriation the amount estimated for that purpose. As a matter of fact, an increase of $15,460 was allowed the Bureau of Plant Industry for the different items of its work outside the free-seed distribution.

apportioned by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] and myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is entitled to one hour, and the gentleman from Virginia to one hour.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CAPRON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 2325) for the relief of James D. Vernay.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

S. 47. An act to create a board for the condemnation of insanitary buildings in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

S. 4046. An act to incorporate the Edes Home; and

S. 3045. An act to incorporate the American Cross of Honor within the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 16954. An act providing for the reappraisement of certain suburban lots in the town site of Port Angeles, Wash.; and

H. R. 14508. An act permitting the building of dams across the North and South branches of Rock River, adjacent to Vandruffs Island and Carrs Island, and across the cut-off between said islands, in Rock Island County, Ill., in aid of navigation and for the development of water power.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 17217. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia regulating proceedings for condemnation of land for streets;"

H. R. 11490. An act granting the Edison Electric Company a permit to occupy certain lands for electric-power plants in the San Bernardino, Sierra, and San Gabriel forest reserves, in the State of California; and

H. R. 18025. An act to regulate shipping in trade between ports of the United States and ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, between ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5581. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building at Passaic, N. J.;

S. 5648. An act to amend section 12 of the act approved February 2, 1901, entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the permanent military establishment of the United States;"

S. 352. An act for the relief of the heirs of Fernando J. Moreno, deceased;

S. 5572. An act to amend section 4348 of the Revised Statutes, establishing great coasting districts of the United States; and

S. 2355. An act to reorganize the corps of dental surgeons attached to the Medical Department of the Army.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 956) providing for the election of a Delegate to the House of Representatives from the district of Alaska.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will yield one hour to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, under the arrangement that I had, that I was to have two hours if I desired it, it may be embarrassing for me to close my speech at the end of the hour; therefore I desire to give notice at this time that if at the end of the hour I have not completed my remarks I shall ask for an extension of time.

Mr. Chairman, I propose to address the House this morning on the topic of the ship-subsidy bill, a topic that is usually discussed with a great deal of interest pending campaigns before the country and about which very little interest is manifested after the election. The language that is used ordinarily by the candidate for President, the party platform, the campaign speakers, and the candidates for Congress who are running before the people is to announce that they are in favor of "encouraging" the building of ships. I embrace this opportunity to announce that the time for "encouragement" has passed and the time for assistance is now here. It will not answer in the future for any political party or any candidate for any office to mislead his hearers by the use of the word "encourage." Encouragement is a dead letter, and the American people who favor some action in behalf of this great measure now demand that the friends of the measure shall cooperate to assist, and "encouragement" will be hereafter ruled out in party platforms and in inaugural addresses and in messages to Congress and in solicitation for support by industrial forces of the United States.

WHAT THE BILL WILL DO.

This bill of the Merchant Marine Commission, which has already passed the Senate, will, in the first place, give the United States what it now absolutely lacks—a trained naval reserve of the picked officers and men of its merchant marine and fisheries instructed in gunnery, enrolled, organized, and disciplined, and ready to man the auxiliary ships or to reenforce the fighting crews in case of war. Every other maritime power except the United States now has such a reserve, a sea militia, a second line of ocean defense, holding the same relation to the regular navy that is held toward the Regular Army by our State militia or National Guard. The existing State naval militia in this country is composed almost entirely of landsmen and is useful only for harbor or coast defense. We need a naval reserve of skilled and hardy professional seamen, the possession of which did much to give Japan a brilliant victory and the lack of which proved a fatal weakness in the naval system of Russia in the recent war.

But we can not have these naval-reserve men unless we have, in the first place, ships on which they can follow their calling of the sea. This bill will give us a fleet of fifty or sixty first-class ocean steamships running on a dozen new lines—vessels aggregating from 200,000 to 300,000 tons, all built on designs approved by the Navy Department and held by the terms of their contract absolutely at the disposal of the Government. These mail ships will constitute a naval reserve of fast transports, ammunition ships, supply ships, auxiliary, repair, and hospital ships, etc., which the report of Admiral Dewey declares are indispensable to the efficiency of our fighting squadrons in case of a contest with a real naval power. Without these auxiliaries the most powerful fleet of battle ships is worthless. Besides auxiliaries for the Navy—one at least for each man-of-war—we must have a large fleet of transports to enable us to send our soldiers in an emergency to China, the Philippines, Hawaii, Alaska, Cuba, Porto Rico, or the Isthmus of Panama. The War Department in its report to the Merchant Marine Commission declares that "Now, and for the immediate future, the force for which our military establishment is maintained can not be exerted over-sea. The first quick blow, so very and increasingly important, can not be struck at all, nor can an expedition of any greater size be embarked without delay, except by the use of foreign vessels. This condition can not improve until the American steam seagoing merchant marine has increased in tonnage to approximately two and one-half times its present volume by the addition of ships adapted in size and design to quick conversion into suitable transports and built under conditions which make their voluntary surrender to the United States on demand a foregone conclusion."

In other words, in a serious war the United States would be absolutely crippled because it has not enough ships to send to our possessions over-seas enough men to defend them against a foreign enemy, and the merchant marine of the United States will have to be increased two and one-half times before it can transport the troops that could be mustered out of our present modest military establishment.

A GREAT FLEET OF CARGO VESSELS.

This bill of the Merchant Marine Commission, through its subventions to cargo vessels, will bring, in ten years or less, a net addition to our cargo carrying and fishery tonnage of 1,500,000 tons, thereby increasing fourfold the actual ocean shipping of the United States and giving us in foreign trade a merchant marine much larger than the entire merchant fleet of France and Norway, twice that of Italy, and twice that of Japan. With such a merchant fleet as this the United States could carry under its own flag not 10 per cent as now, but 30 or 40 per cent of its own imports and exports, and these ships would earn for their country, instead of $20,000,000, from $60,000,000 to $80,000,000 annually in mail, freight, and passenger receipts, compensating us many times over for the total cost of the subventions.

These cargo ships and the dozen new lines of American mail steamships to South America, Central America, Africa, Asia, and the Philippines will reduce freight rates at the same time they improve our transportation service. They will have the same effect that a competing railroad has upon the traffic of any given community. Instead of old, slow, ramshackle foreign craft that now crawl out irregularly with our products to South America, we shall have regular, swift, and economical American steamers. These ships must be built in the coast States of the Atlantic, Pacific, or Gulf of Mexico. But the materials for their hulls and machinery will be drawn from many States—from the iron mines of Lake Superior, from the forests of Michigan, Wisconsin, and the South. And the cargoes which these ships will carry will come from every State and every Territory in the Union.

A great, prosperous merchant fleet will benefit not only the coast States and their people but the people of every State and Territory. This will be a new national industry giving work and wages to thousands and tens of thousands of our population. "Ships," declares President Roosevelt, "work for their own countries just as railroads work for their terminal points." These ships, once built and afloat, will get to work to make new markets for the products of the agriculture of the Mississippi Valley, the grain States of the Northwest, the cotton States of the South and Southwest, and the manufactures of New England, New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, and Indiana. They will put an end forever to the present humiliating dependence upon our foreign competitors for the means of reaching the markets where we and they are striving for the mastery. We shall have delivery wagons of our own without relying upon the delivery wagons of our rivals. And above all we shall have waiting and ready a great fleet of auxiliaries and a great body of brave, skilled, and patriotic American seamen who, while serving our trade in peace, will be ready to defend our coasts and our flag in war.

All this can be done at a cost to start with of between one and two million dollars a year and a cost on the average for ten years of no more than four or five millions, which is not more than is being paid now in national aid to steamship lines by our chief competitors and a mere fraction of the sum which we are expending on our Army and our Navy, to say nothing of the stupendous task of building the isthmian canal—a canal which, when built, unless this bill is passed, will float nothing but men-of-war and the merchant ships of our commercial adversaries.

IN A NUTSHELL.

Speaking more concisely, it may be said that, in a nutshell, Senate bill 529, framed by the President's Merchant Marine Commission, and passed February 14, 1906, by the Senate, provides for:

1. A volunteer naval reserve of 10,000 officers and men of the merchant marine and fisheries, trained in gunnery, etc., subject to the call of the President in war, and receiving retainer bounties, as 33,500 British naval-reserve men do.

2. Subventions at the rate of $5 a gross ton a year to all cargo vessels in the foreign trade of the United States and to craft of the deep-sea fisheries, and $6.50 a ton to vessels engaged in our Philippine commerce, the Philippine coastwise law being postponed till 1909. But these cargo vessels, in order to receive subventions, must be held at the disposal of the Government in war, must convey the mails free of charge, be seaworthy and efficient, carry a certain proportion of Americans and naval-reserve men in their crews, and make all ordinary repairs in the United States. Ships lose their subventions if they leave our trade for that of foreign countries, or if, like the Standard Oil craft, they are not engaged exclusively as common carriers.

3. Subventions to new mail lines from the Atlantic coast to Brazil, Argentina, and South Africa; from the South Atlantic coast to Cuba; from the Gulf coast to Cuba, Brazil, Mexico, Central America, and the Isthmus of Panama; from the Pacific coast, via Hawaii, to Japan, China, and the Philippines, and to Mexico, Central America, and the Isthmus of Panama, and from the North Pacific coast direct to Japan, China, and the Philippines, with increased compensation to one existing contract line from the Pacific coast, via Hawaii and Samoa, to Australasia.

All ships receiving subventions must be already American by register or American built, thus excluding the foreign-built fleet of the Atlantic steamship combination. Not one dollar is given to fast passenger and mail lines to Europe. Ships constructed for foreign commerce to receive these subventions can, under the Dingley tariff, be built, equipped, and repaired of materials imported free of duty.

The maximum annual cost of the proposed mail subventions will be about $3,000,000; of the other subventions and retainers to the naval reserve from $1,550,000 in 1907 to $5,750,000 in 1916.

Great Britain next year will pay $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 in shipping subsidies; France, $8,000,000; Italy, $3,000,000, and Japan about $4,000,000.

THE INTERESTS OF LABOR.

As will be more fully stated further on, there is being paid for the transportation of our foreign commerce something like $200,000,000 per annum. Substantially all of it goes to foreign labor. Not only is this true, but each recurring ship that is built to keep up the necessary volume of shipping to carry our products abroad is built in a foreign land. The material is mined, hewed from the forests, shaped into ships, and paid for by money every dollar of which ought to be the reward of American labor.

Let me speak of the interests of American labor for a moment. You profess to be alert to the interests of American labor. The men of organized labor are demanding that in the public institutions of the country where convict and other forms of cheap labor are employed manufactured articles shall not be produced to glut the American market, and yet two or three leaders of organized labor in the United States, without rhyme or reason, without knowledge or sense, simply negative every effort of organized labor to be heard in behalf of the greatest project that American labor is to-day interested in.

Put the American ship in its proper relation to the business and commerce of the United States and in the production of the raw material of the ship, in the construction of the ship, in the manning and officering of the ship, in the running and handling of the ship, more than $500,000,000 of money would come to us, a vast percentage of which would go into the pockets of labor. The laboring men of this country should organize as they have never organized before and with moral suasion and ballots should demand that this un-American tirade against American interests should cease, and cease now. The silence in abandoned shipyards, the paralysis of labor heretofore engaged in these works are impressive monitors that the laboring man of this country is being led like the sheep to the shamble by one or two men who dare to dictate the ruinous policy of buying our ships abroad and maintaining our ships abroad by paying the money abroad for all these vast expenditures. So much for the attitude of the laboring man.

I take great pleasure in announcing that within the last few weeks the labor organizations throughout the country are rapidly coming to understand the situation, and many of the strongest appeals for the passage of this bill that we have come from organized labor in defiance of the men who stand throttling an intelligent expression of their views.

WHAT IS A SUBSIDY?

Mr. Chairman, we are spending in the United States enormous sums of money for subsidies. Yet, Mr. Chairman, the word "subsidy" shocks a great many of the American people. If you can only correctly call a thing a subsidy you have enlisted a clamor equal to General Grant's recollection of the sound of the coyotes in his first famous journey across the plains. What is a subsidy? A subsidy is well defined by the word "subsidize" in the dictionaries—"to furnish with a subsidy; to purchase assistance by the payment of a subsidy; to assist an individual or an undertaking with money; pecuniary aid, aid given in money; to specify; an aid or tax formerly granted by Parliament to the Crown to meet urgent or pressing necessities, levied on every subject of ability according to the value of his lands or goods."

The appropriation bills of Congress from year to year are crowded and, I might say, overwhelmed with subsidies. We expend more money per annum for the deepening and widening and straightening of the rivers and harbors of the United States than would carry the operations of this bill through to the end of its existence—ten years—and every dollar of that money is a subsidy to the commerce of the country.

No sooner does a foreign shipbuilder announce that the present draft of his largest ship is not met by corresponding depth of water in American harbors, and that he could make more money if the American Congress would excavate the American harbor a little deeper, so that the foreign ships could carry a little more cargo and earn a little more money, than the American Congress rushes its engineering force to ascertain and make a project for the deepening of the harbors of the country in order that the foreign demand for deeper water and deeper draft of ships shall be met out of the pockets of the American people. That is a matter of pure subsidy, nothing else; it can be described by no other name; it meets the dictionary definition; it meets the common-sense definition; it meets every definition. Every dollar of money that is expended by the United States Government in deepening, widening, and perfecting the harbors of our seacoast, every dollar that is expended in the magnificent improvement of our great chains of mighty lakes, every dollar that is spent in the deepening, straightening, and widening of the great network of rivers that encompass our country—every dollar of it is a subsidy to aid the commerce of the American people.

WHAT SUBSIDY HAS DONE.

When I first became a Member of Congress the freight upon a ton of iron ore from the upper Great Lakes to the harbors along the shore of Ohio was about $2 a ton, and the vessels that were carrying ore were carrying about 2,500 tons for a cargo, and they could get into some of the harbors which had a depth of 8 or 9 feet of water and deliver their cargoes and go back to the source of supply. To-day 10,000 tons is the complement of one of these magnificent ships, and about 75 cents a ton the cost of delivering the ore at the ports of Ashtabula, Cleveland, and the other places of distribution down to the location of the furnaces. We have dug out and excavated these harbors to a depth of 19, 20, and 22 feet of water. Every dollar of it came out of the public Treasury of the United States, and every dollar of it was a subsidy to the commerce of this country.

We are spending $44,000,000 annually as a subsidy to the railroad systems of the country in developing the internal commerce of the country by the transmission of the mails of the country; and we invest $100,000,000 in the Navy annually for the promotion and protection and distribution of what? A phantom commerce! A phantom ocean trade!

We talk about the construction of a mighty navy, and I am not opposed to it; we talk about having a navy that can protect our commerce in all the countries of the world. Why, Mr. Chairman, we have no commerce in all the countries of the world. We are building a navy that in time of peace has no occupation but to fit itself for war and protect our commerce carried in the ships of other nations.

I do not care to go over these items of subsidy. The whole growth, the whole mighty progress of the nation has gone steadily forward to the tremendous proportions of to-day based upon subsidies that the people of the United States through the action of Congress have conferred upon the various instrumentalities of production and commerce. We are proud of our trade abroad, and it is magnificent. Its growth is realized at the Treasury Department every day of our lives. The month of March was greater than any other month of March in the history of our nation. The condition of the financial year from the 30th of June to that period was greater than any other like period in the history of our nation. The calendar year that ended on the last day of December last showed our commerce abroad was greater than in any other like period in our nation's history. But, Mr. Chairman, ninety one-hundredths of all the mighty commerce was carried in foreign ships, carried under foreign flags, and $200,000,000 last year, and nearly $200,000,000 the year before, were taken out of the pockets of the American people and paid over to the labor of the various countries of Europe, who have wisdom and sense enough to patronize the merchant marine.

Mr. Chairman, there has not been a keel laid for an ocean-going ship in a shipyard of the United States during the last twelve months, while millions of dollars of British money and German money and Japanese money have gone to the commercial shipyards of those countries to build gigantic vessels of trade to carry our commerce to such customers as those countries see fit to carry that commerce to, and we, bowing to their demands, are preparing our rivers and harbors for their accommodation.

THE EXAMPLE OF JAPAN.

Mr. Chairman, we see a great deal about the Japanese nation, and sometimes we hear people wondering if the Japanese are not in some way to become aggressors against the American people, or whether they will not seize upon the Philippine Islands, whether they will not become aggressors by their immigration into our country. Let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, where they began to be aggressors upon American commerce—the very day that the armistice was signed between the Russian Government and the Japanese Government. Every spare shipyard in Japan was transferred as if by magic from the building of war ships to the building of merchant ships, and to-day more ships for over-sea commerce are being constructed in Japan than anywhere in any nation of the earth except Great Britain.

We have bearing the American flag in the Pacific Ocean about nine or ten ships. They are carrying the passengers and the commerce, such as they can carry, from San Francisco and Seattle to the oriental countries—about one ship where there ought to be ten ships, about one man employed where there ought to be ten men employed, and all the balance of our trade that might become mighty and profitable is carried in foreign vessels to foreign markets in the hands of foreign traders. But that is not all. Information comes to us—and it will appear to Members of Congress who read the hearings before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries—that to-day offers of purchase have been made to the owners of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company for their five great ships, and those offers are very satisfactory—more than satisfactory—and this information is coupled with the further information, that comes to us beyond a possible doubt of its reliability, that the Japanese Government, in consideration that that purchase shall be made by a Japanese corporation, has said that it will give to the owners of those ships most profitable and very elaborate subsidies. For what purpose? To carry the commerce of the United States, and to control the commerce of the United States, and carry it where they see fit to carry it, and bring their commerce into the United States of America.

And the same is true of the ships sailing from Seattle, as I am informed. We have no such definite information upon that question as we have upon the other, but it is entirely manifest that the aggressions of the Japanese Government against our Government are to be the aggression of domination upon the merchant marine of the country and the carrying of all the commerce and the control of all the commerce between foreign countries and our own.

SAN FRANCISCO'S NEED OF THE SHIPPING BILL.

San Francisco has two lines of American steamers in the over-seas trade, crossing the Pacific Ocean. One is the Pacific Mail Line, of five steamers, to Japan, China, and the Philippines. The other is the Oceanic Line to New Zealand and Australia.

These are, by all odds, the largest and most important steamship companies operating out of San Francisco. Their head offices are there. Their agents and employees are there. They pay the wages and salaries on sea and shore of a great many men, and the business which they conduct is worth many millions of dollars annually to San Francisco and to California.

The Oceanic Company is now receiving a small, insufficient subsidy, a very much smaller amount than European lines from Europe and Canada to Australia are paid for inferior service. The Pacific Mail Company receives only from $60,000 to $80,000 a year, at the rate of so much per pound, for carrying the United States mails to the Orient. A competing parallel Japanese line of only three steamers, employing only Japanese and not one American, receives a subsidy of from $500,000 to $600,000 from the Japanese Government.

Neither the Oceanic Company nor the Pacific Mail Company has for years paid a dividend. The Oceanic Company, in fact, has been losing several hundred thousand dollars annually. The shipping bill of the Merchant Marine Commission provides an increased subvention of $217,000 a year for our Australian mail service, which would bring the Oceanic Company approximately on even terms with its foreign competitors. This bill also provides $600,000 a year for an improved mail service to Japan, China, and the Philippines, which would enable the Pacific Mail Company to build more American ships and run more frequently across the Pacific to Manila.

The city of San Francisco has never had much manufacturing. It has lived by the sea and from the sea. The foundation of its prosperiy has been the fact that it was our great national gateway for our Pacific commerce. Congress has already granted several million dollars for feeding the hungry and clothing the naked refugees from San Francisco's great disaster. But the surest, most effective, and most permanent thing that Congress can do to rebuild the ruined city and revive its stricken trade is to pass this shipping bill of the Merchant Marine Commission, with its provisions for encouraging not only American steamship lines to the Orient and Australasia, but a third line from San Francisco down the coast to Mexico, Central America, and the Isthmus of Panama.

This ocean commerce is the very lifeblood of San Francisco. The city can not exist without it. Nothing would so hearten and strengthen the business men and the wage-earners of San Francisco as the news from Washington that the Congress of the United States had stepped in and assured to them the continuance of their great lines of ocean steamers.

Unless this bill is passed and passed at once, it is certain that these American steamship lines, on which the prosperity, even the life, of San Francisco largely depends, will not be continued. They can not be run indefinitely against the subsidized shipping of Europe and Japan. Even before this disaster it was known in San Francisco, and it has become known in Washington, that the fate of these American steamship companies hung absolutely on the passage of the shipping bill. For there are nations in Europe—there is even a nation in Asia—which know what we Americans seem to have forgotten—that trade follows the flag, and that the people who control the ships are bound ultimately to control the commerce of the world.

Japan subsidizes all her ocean ships. She subsidizes her shipyards. Her merchant tonnage has grown more rapidly of late years than that of any other nation in the world. Thanks to her subsidies, creating a great naval reserve, she had the ships and the sailors to whip Russia. Japan's statesmen know well enough that our American steamship lines can not survive without dividends, and her merchants, with generous subsidies guaranteed, are endeavoring to buy both of these American Pacific steamship companies. The Congress of the United States has been given ample warning that if the shipping bill is not immediately passed by the House of Representatives this Japanese effort will succeed, and the Stars and Stripes will be hauled down from the masthead of the two oldest American steamship lines crossing the Pacific Ocean.

BLOTTING OUT OUR OWN NAVAL RESERVE.

This would be a calamity for the United States, but it would be a still more terrible calamity for San Francisco. When the Japanese flag went up every American officer, every American sailor would have to go over the side. It is the pride of the Japanese to man their ships throughout with their own people. That would mean the blotting out of most of our meager resources in the way of a naval reserve on the Pacific. It would mean the transfer of the headquarters of these American lines from San Francisco to Yokohama.

It might mean more than this. For there can be no guaranty that if the Japanese flag is hoisted over these American ships they will continue to run in the trade of San Francisco. Once under Japanese control, they can be sent, and most certainly will be sent, wherever they will best serve Japanese interests. There are no ships so fine as some of these American ships in the whole Japanese merchant fleet. The great pride of Japanese shipowners is their subsidized line from Japan to Europe—subsidized at the rate of more than a million dollars a year. If the Japanese Government took it into its head to order the transfer of these American liners to the European line it could do so, and in that event San Francisco would be left entirely without any communication with China or the Philippines, and our main line of oriental commerce would be paralyzed.

So, too, with the Oceanic Line to Australasia. This is now operating under a mail contract with the United States Government, which requires the steamers to be run via Samoa to Auckland and Sydney, and nowhere else. But the contract would necessarily terminate if these ships were purchased by the Japanese. They could then be taken wherever their new owners pleased. And where that would be it is not difficult to conjecture. The Japanese Government has been endeavoring to build up a competing line from Yokohama to Australia. Thus far it has not secured any satisfactory steamers. Its vessels are inferior to American ships, and there can be no question whatever that one motive of the Japanese in securing the Oceanic steamers would be to take them out of San Francisco and transfer them to their own Japanese-Australian line, thus paralyzing our best route of communication with the Australian markets, to which our exports have increased of late years from $12,000,000 to $27,000,000 a year, and turning this market over to the merchants of Japan, Europe, and Canada.

Now, the fate of these American Pacific lines, involving to a large degree the future of San Francisco, is in the hands of the House of Representatives. Pass this bill and you will give new hope and new courage to the merchants and the wage-earners there by the smoking ruins at the Golden Gate. Defeat this bill, or postpone it, and you haul down the American flag from the masthead of the best fleet on the Pacific and strike the city of San Francisco and our whole trans-Pacific trade a blow from which they will never recover.

It is for the House of Representatives, by its action on the shipping bill of the Merchant Marine Commission, to say which course shall be pursued.

NEW LINES TO SOUTH AMERICA.

Now, in that condition we come forward with a measure that does not carry, at the utmost dollar that it can ever cost the Government, as much money as the deepening and widening of a few harbors of the United States has cost the Government. Take the expenditures upon the Great Lakes of the country, and one fraction of the money expended there will meet every dollar that it is proposed to carry under this so-called "subsidy bill," and the effect of it would be to open up five or six lines of communication with South America.

Do gentlemen who are studying the coming day of American commerce have any appreciation of the fact that to-day if you wanted to ship a cargo of goods quickly, or if you wanted to travel in comfort yourself to Rio Janeiro, your course would not be to go to the seacoast of America and take either an American or a foreign ship and go direct to the South American ports? No; you would have to go to Southampton or to Liverpool and reship upon a British ship and deliver yourself in due time at the South American port. And all this because the cry of "subsidy" has so misled the American people that we stand to-day awed in the prospect of the destruction of our merchant marine, afraid of the people who wield a petty whip of politics, and afraid to assert our own best judgment upon this matter.

Why should this question be a question of party politics? Why should the division line be drawn along party lines in opposition to this measure? The Republican party has been fierce in its conventions to proclaim its fealty to a purpose to bring about the upbuilding of the Navy, and yet individual Members have fits of hysterics when you mention the subject to them, and they tell you: "My people are not interested in this matter." There is no question of American economical concern to-day that is of more vital interest to every industrial man in the United States. They tell us that the newspapers of the country are not in favor of it. Let us see. First, I want to produce here the history of Republican support to this measure:

THREE PRESIDENTS SPEAK FOR AMERICAN SHIPPING.

Benjamin Harrison: "Our great competitors have established and maintained their lines by government subsidies until they have now practically excluded us from participation. In my opinion, no choice is left to us but to pursue, moderately at least, the same lines."

William McKinley: "I am satisfied the judgment of the country favors the policy of aid to our merchant marine which will broaden our commerce and markets and upbuild our sea carrying capacity for the products of agriculture and manufacturing."

Theodore Roosevelt: "Ships work for their own countries, just as railroads work for their terminal points. * * * From every standpoint it is unwise for the United States to continue to rely upon the ships of competing nations for the distribution of our goods. It should be made advantageous to carry American goods in American-built ships."

Three successive Republican Presidents—two from the Middle West and one from the great commercial State of New York—have urged in the strongest terms throughout their Administrations the upbuilding of American shipping in the foreign trade.

One of the three was Benjamin Harrison, of Indiana, who was elected in 1888 on a platform declaring:

"We earnestly recommend that prompt action be taken by Congress in the enactment of such legislation as will best secure the rehabilitation of our merchant marine, and we protest against the passage by Congress of a free-ship bill as calculated to work injustice to labor by lessening the wages of those engaged in preparing the materials, as well as those directly employed in our shipyards."

President Harrison, in his first inaugural message to Congress, March 4, 1889, thus proclaimed his devotion to the cause of the American ship:

"We should encourage the establishment of American steamship lines. The exchanges of commerce demand stated, reliable, and rapid means of communication, and until these are provided the development of our trade with the states lying south of us is impossible."

In his first annual message to Congress, on December 3, 1889, President Harrison enlarged upon this theme with growing emphasis:

"There is nothing more justly humiliating to the national pride and nothing more hurtful to the national prosperity than the inferiority of our merchant marine compared with that of other nations whose general resources, wealth, and seacoast lines do not suggest any reason for their supremacy on the sea. It was not always so, and our people are agreed, I think, that it shall not continue to be so. * * *

"FOREIGN LINES ARE SUBSIDIZED.

"That the great steamship lines sailing under the flags of England, France, Germany, Spain, and Italy, and engaged in foreign commerce, were promoted, and have since been and now are liberally aided by grants of public money in some form or another is generally known. That the American lines of steamships have been abandoned by us to an unequal contest with the aided lines of other nations until they have been withdrawn or, in the few cases where they are still maintained, are subject to serious disadvantages is matter of common knowledge.

"MUST NOW GO VIA ENGLAND.

"The present situation is such that travelers and merchandise find Liverpool even a necessary intermediate point between New York and some of the South American capitals. The fact that some of the delegates from South American States to the conference of American nations now in session at Washington reached our shores by reversing that line of travel is very conclusive of the need of such a conference, and very suggestive as to the first and necessary step in the direction of fuller and more beneficial intercourse with nations that are now our neighbors upon the lines of latitude, but not upon the lines of established commercial intercourse.

"LIBERAL AID FOR AMERICAN LINES.

"I recommend that such appropriations be made for ocean mail service, in American steamships, between our ports and those of Central America, China, Japan, and the important islands in both of the great oceans, as will be liberally remunerative for the service rendered, and as will encourage the establishment and in some fair degree equalize the chances of American steamship lines in the competition which they must meet. That the American states lying south of us will gladly cooperate in establishing and maintaining such lines of steamships to their principal ports I do not doubt.

"OUR NEED OF A NAVAL RESERVE.

"We should also make provision for a naval reserve, to consist of such merchant ships, of American construction and of a specific tonnage and speed, as the owners will consent to place at the use of the Government in case of need as armed cruisers. England has adopted this policy, and as a result can now upon necessity at once place upon her naval list some of the fastest steamships in the world. A proper supervision of the construction of such vessels would make their conversion into effective ships of war very easy.

"BLIND AND FALSE 'ECONOMY.'

"I am an advocate of economy in our national expenditures, but it is a misuse of terms to make this word describe a policy that withholds an expenditure for the purpose of extending our foreign commerce. The enlargement and improvement of our merchant marine, the development of a sufficient body of trained seamen, the promotion of rapid and regular mail communication between the ports of other countries and our own, and the adaptation of large and swift American merchant steamships to naval uses, in time of war, are public purposes of the highest concern.

"A BENEFIT TO ALL THE PEOPLE.

"The enlarged participation of our people in the carrying trade, the new and increased markets that will be found for the products of our farms and factories, and the fuller and better employment of our mechanics, which will result from a liberal promotion of our foreign commerce, insure the widest possible diffusion of benefit to all the States and to all the people. Everything is most propitious for the present inauguration of a liberal and progressive policy upon this subject, and we should enter upon it with promptness and decision."

HARRISON SPEAKS AGAIN.

President Harrison, in his second message to Congress, on December 1, 1890, made the merchant marine again the subject of a most earnest and emphatic recommendation:

"I desire to repeat with added urgency the recommendations contained in my last annual message in relation to the development of American steamship lines. The reciprocity clause of the tariff bill will be largely limited, and its benefits retarded and diminished, if provision is not contemporaneously made to encourage the establishment of first-class steam communication between our ports and the ports of those nations as may meet our overtures for enlargement of commercial exchanges.

"A FIRST CONDITION OF FOREIGN TRADE.

"The steamship, carrying the mails statedly and frequently, offering to passengers a comfortable, safe, and speedy transit, is the first condition of foreign trade. It carries the order or the buyer, but not all that is ordered or bought. It gives to the sailing vessels such cargoes as are not urgent or perishable, and, indirectly at least, promotes that important adjunct of commerce. There is now both in this country and in the nations of Central and South America a state of expectation and confidence as to increased trade that will give a double value to your prompt action upon this question. * * *

"LINES TO SOUTH AMERICA.

"The South Atlantic and Gulf ports occupy a very favored position toward the new and important commerce which the reciprocity clause of the tariff act and the postal shipping bill are designed to promote. Steamship lines from these ports to some northern port of South America will almost certainly effect a connection between the railroad systems of the continents long before any continuous line of railroads can be put into operation. The very large appropriation made at the last session for the harbor of Galveston was justified, as it seemed to me, for these considerations. The great Northwest will feel the advantage of trunk lines to the South as well as to the East and of the markets found for their surplus food products and for many of their manufactured products."

A NEW LAW PASSED AND SIGNED.

Before another annual message was written, President Harrison, on March 3, 1891, had the satisfaction of signing a new law, the direct fruit of his earnest and patriotic recommendations, extending national aid to lines of American steamers. But, unfortunately, the original rates of compensation proposed in this measure, which had been fixed by expert authority at an amount just sufficient for the purpose, were cut down one-third on the solicitation of a few middle western men when the bill passed the House of Representatives. This seriously crippled the efficiency of the new measure so far as South America was concerned.

Though this legislation did create one American line to Europe, two to the West Indies, one to Venezuela, and finally one to Australasia, the experience of fifteen years has now demonstrated that the hasty reduction in the rate of the mail subventions was a deplorable error, justifying the remonstrances of the friends of the measure, who predicted that, thus heavily reduced, the law would prove a disappointment.

SOME GOOD RESULTS.

The immediate result, however, was beneficial in creating new lines to near-by markets, and President Harrison was enabled to sound a note of congratulation in his message to Congress on December 6, 1892:

"Ever since our merchant marine was driven from the sea by the rebel cruisers during the war of the rebellion the United States has been paying an enormous annual tribute to foreign countries in the shape of freight and passage moneys. Our grain and meats have been taken at our own docks and our large imports there laid down by foreign shipmasters.

"DIVIDENDS TO FOREIGNERS.

"An increasing torrent of American travel to Europe has contributed a vast sum annually to the dividends of foreign shipowners. The balance of trade shown by the books of the custom-houses has been very largely reduced and in many years altogether extinguished by this constant drain. In the year 1892 only 12.3 per cent of our imports were brought in American vessels. These great foreign steamships maintained by our traffic are many of them under contracts with their respective governments by which in time of war they will become a part of their armed naval establishments. Profiting by our commerce in peace, they will become the most formidable destroyers of our commerce in time of war.

"A CHANGE OF POLICY.

"I have felt, and have before expressed the feeling, that this condition of things was both intolerable and disgraceful. A wholesome change of policy and one having in it much promise, as it seems to me, was begun by the law of March 3, 1891. Under this law contracts have been made by the Postmaster-General for eleven mail routes. The expenditure involved by these contracts for the next fiscal year approximates $954,123.33. As one of the results already reached sixteen American steamships of an aggregate tonnage of 57,400 tons, costing $7,400,000, have been built or contracted to be built in American shipyards. * * *

"SUBSIDIES ARE INDISPENSABLE.

"No subject, I think, more nearly touches the pride, the power, and the prosperity of our country than this of the development of our merchant marine upon the sea. If we could enter into conference with our competitors and all would agree to withhold government aid we could perhaps take our chances with the rest, but our great competitors have established and maintained their lines by government subsidies until they now have practically excluded us from participation. In my opinion no choice is left to us but to pursue, moderately at least, the same lines."

PRESIDENT M'KINLEY'S COUNSEL.

The next Republican President, William McKinley, of Ohio, was known as a strong champion of the American merchant marine long before his election to this great office. In the debate on the new tariff bill that bore his name, on May 7, 1890, in the House of Representatives, Chairman McKinley had said:

"If the United States would give the same encouragement to her merchant marine and her steamship lines as is given by other nations to their ships, this commerce on the seas under the American flag would increase and multiply. When the United States will spend from her Treasury from $5,000,000 to $6,000,000 a year for that purpose, as do France and Great Britain to maintain their steamship lines, our ships will plow every sea in successful competition with the ships of the world. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] Will you gentlemen join us in encouraging our merchant marine?" [Renewed applause on the Republican side.]

BOTH BUSINESS AND PATRIOTISM.

Holding these earnest opinions, President McKinley avowed them in his first inaugural address, on March 4, 1897:

"Congress should give prompt attention to the restoration of our American merchant marine, once the pride of the seas on all the great ocean highways of commerce. To my mind, few more important subjects so imperatively demand its intelligent consideration. The United States has progressed with marvelous rapidity in every field of enterprise and endeavor until we have become foremost in nearly all of the great lines of inland trade, commerce, and industry. Yet, while this is true, our American merchant marine has been steadily declining until it is now lower, both in the percentage of tonnage and the number of vessels employed, than it was prior to the civil war.

"Commendable progress has been made of late years in the upbuilding of the American Navy, but we must supplement these efforts by providing as a proper consort for it a merchant marine amply sufficient for our own carrying trade to foreign countries. The question is one that appeals both to our business interests and the patriotic aspirations of a great people."

PROGRESS ON THE SEAS.

President McKinley reiterated these views in his first annual message to Congress, on December 6, 1897, and he expressed himself even more positively and at greater length on December 5, 1899, after the illuminating experience of the Spanish war:

"The value of an American merchant marine to the expansion of our commercial trade and the strengthening of our power upon the sea invites the immediate action of the Congress. Our national development will be one-sided and unsatisfactory so long as the remarkable growth of our inland industries remains unaccompanied by progress on the seas. There is no lack of constitutional authority for legislation which shall give to the country maritime strength commensurate with its industrial achievement and with its rank among the nations of the earth.

"IN THE LIGHT OF THE WAR.

"Last year American vessels transported a smaller share of our exports and imports than during any former year in all our history, and the measure of our dependence upon foreign shipping was painfully manifested to our people. Without any choice of our own, but from necessity, the Departments of the Government charged with military and naval operations in the East and West Indies had to obtain from foreign flags merchant vessels essential for those operations.

"OTHER NATIONS DO NOT HESITATE.

"The other great nations have not hesitated to adopt the required means to develop their shipping as a factor in national defense and as one of the surest and speediest means of obtaining for their producers a share in foreign markets. Like vigilance and opportunity on our part can not fail but improve our situation, which is regarded with humiliation at home and with surprise abroad. Even the seeming sacrifices, which at the beginning may be inevitable, will be offset later by more than equivalent gains.

"THE EXPENSE AS NOTHING.

"The expense is as nothing compared to the large object achieved. The reestablishment of our merchant marine involves in a large measure our continued industrial progress and the extension of our commercial triumphs. I am satisfied the judgment of the country favors the policy of aid to our merchant marine, which will broaden our commerce and markets and upbuild our sea-carrying capacity for the products of agriculture and manufacturing; which, with the increase of our Navy, means more work and wages to our countrymen, as well as a safeguard to American interests in every part of the world."

AMERICAN SHIPS FOR AMERICAN TRADE.

In his fourth and last message to Congress, on December 3, 1900, after his triumphant reelection, President McKinley said:

"American vessels during the past three years have carried about 9 per cent of our exports and imports. Foreign ships should carry the least, not the greatest, part of American trade. The remarkable growth of our steel industries, the progress of shipbuilding for the domestic trade, and our steadily maintained expenditures for the Navy have created an opportunity to place the United States in the first rank of commercial maritime powers.

"WILL REDUCE FREIGHT CHARGES.

"Besides realizing a proper national aspiration this will mean the establishment and healthy growth along all our coasts of a distinctive national industry, extending the field for the profitable employment of labor and capital. It will increase the transportation facilities and reduce freight charges on the vast volume of products brought from the interior to the seaboard for export, and will strengthen an arm of the national defense upon which the founders of the Government and their successors have relied. In again urging immediate action by the Congress on measures to promote American shipping and foreign trade, I direct attention to the recommendation on the subject in previous messages, but particularly to the opinion expressed in the message of 1899:

"'THE COUNTRY FAVORS.

"'I am satisfied the judgment of the country favors the policy of aid to our merchant marine, which will broaden our commerce and markets and upbuild our sea-carrying capacity for the products of agriculture and manufacturing, which, with the increase of our Navy, means more work and wages to our countrymen, as well as a safeguard to American interests in every part of the world.'"

M'KINLEY'S LAST WORDS.

In his very last words to his fellow-countrymen, on that fateful September 5, 1901, at the Pan-American Exposition, just before the bullet of the assassin struck him, President McKinley coupled his memorable plea for wider markets with a fervent demand for an American merchant marine:

"Then, too, we have inadequate steamship service. New lines of steamers have already been put into commission between the Pacific coast ports of the United States and those of the western coast of Mexico and Central and South America. These should be followed up with direct lines between the eastern coast of the United States and South American ports. One of the needs of the times is direct commercial lines from our vast fields of production to the fields of consumption that we have but barely touched. Next in advantage to having the thing to sell is to have the convenience to carry it to the buyer. We must encourage our merchant marine. We must have more ships. They must be under the American flag, built and manned and owned by Americans. These will not only be profitable in a commercial sense; they will be messengers of peace and amity wherever they go."

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S APPEAL.

President Theodore Roosevelt, of New York, in this as in so many other things, followed loyally in the course of his beloved predecessor—his enthusiasm for the Navy, inspiring naturally this exhortation of his first annual message, on December 3, 1901:

"The condition of the American merchant marine is such as to call for immediate remedial action by the Congress. It is discreditable to us as a nation that our merchant marine should be utterly insignificant in comparison to that of other nations, which we overtop in other forms of business. We should no longer submit to conditions under which only a trifling portion of our great commerce is carried in our own ships. To remedy this state of things would not merely serve to build up our shipping interests, but it would also result in benefit to all who are interested in the permanent establishment of a wider market for American products, and would provide an auxiliary force for the Navy.

"SHIPS WORK FOR THEIR COUNTRY.

"Ships work for their own countries just as railroads work for their terminal points. Shipping lines, if established to the principal countries with which we have dealings, would be of political as well as commercial benefit. From every standpoint it is unwise for the United States to continue to rely upon the ships of competing nations for the distribution of our goods. It should be made advantageous to carry American goods in American-built ships.

"AMERICAN SHIPPING HANDICAPPED.

"At present American shipping is under certain great disadvantages when put into competition with the shipping of foreign countries. Many of the fast foreign steamships, at a speed of 14 knots or above, are subsidized; and all our ships, sailing vessels and steamers alike, cargo carriers of slow speed and mail liners of high speed, have to meet the fact that the original cost of building American ships is greater than is the case abroad; that the wages paid American officers and seamen are very much higher than those paid to officers and seamen of foreign competing countries; and that the standard of living on our ships is far superior to the standard of living on the ships of our commercial rivals.

"Our Government should take such action as will remedy these inequalities. The American merchant marine should be restored to the ocean."

URGING A COMMISSION.

In his message of December 3, 1903, President Roosevelt offered this specific recommendation:

"A majority of our people desire that steps be taken in the interest of American shipping, so that we may once more resume our former position in the ocean carrying trade. But hitherto the differences of opinion as to the proper method of reaching this end have been so wide that it has proved impossible to secure the adoption of any particular scheme. Having in view these facts, I recommend that the Congress direct the Secretary of the Navy, the Postmaster-General, and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, associated with such a representation from the Senate and the House of Representatives as the Congress in its wisdom may designate, to serve as a commission for the purpose of investigating and reporting to the Congress at its next session what legislation is desirable or necessary for the development of the American merchant marine and American commerce, and incidentally of a national ocean mail service of adequate auxiliary naval cruisers and naval reserves. While such a measure is desirable in any event, it is especially desirable at this time, in view of the fact that our present governmental contract for ocean mail with the American Line will expire in 1905.

"LINES OF CARGO SHIPS.

"Our ocean mail act was passed in 1891. In 1895 our 20-knot trans-Atlantic mail line was equal to any foreign line. Since then the Germans have put on 23-knot steamers, and the British have contracted for 24-knot steamers. Our service should equal the best. If it does not, the commercial public will abandon it. If we are to stay in the business, it ought to be with the full understanding of the advantages to the country on the one hand, and on the other with exact knowledge of the cost and proper methods of carrying it on. Moreover, lines of cargo ships are of even more importance than fast mail lines, save so far as the latter can be depended upon to furnish swift auxiliary cruisers in time of war. The establishment of new lines of cargo ships to South America, to Asia, and elsewhere would be much in the interest of our commercial expansion."

THE ROOSEVELT PLATFORM.

Congress responded with the act of April 28, 1904, creating the Merchant Marine Commission of five Senators and five Representatives. For nearly two years thereafter this Commission was pursuing its appointed work. Meanwhile, in the autumn of 1904, Theodore Roosevelt was elected President on a platform declaring:

"While every other industry has prospered under the fostering aid of Republican legislation, American shipping engaged in foreign trade, in competition with the low cost of construction, low wages, and heavy subsidies of foreign governments, has not for many years received from the Government of the United States adequate encouragement of any kind. We therefore favor legislation which will encourage and build up the American merchant marine, and we cordially approve the legislation of the last Congress, which created the Merchant Marine Commission to investigate and report upon this subject."

Before the inquiry of the Commission was entirely completed, in his message of December, 1904, to Congress, President Roosevelt said:

"I especially commend to your immediate attention the encouragement of our merchant marine by appropriate legislation."

THE COMMISSION AND ITS WORK.

Finally the report and recommendations of the Merchant Marine Commission in comprehensive form were laid before Congress, and in his message of December 5, 1905, President Roosevelt said:

"To the spread of our trade in peace and the defense of our flag in war a great and prosperous merchant marine is indispensable. We should have ships of our own and seamen of our own to convey our goods to neutral markets, and in case of need to reenforce our battle line. It can not but be a source of regret and uneasiness to us that the lines of communication with our sister republics of South America should be chiefly under foreign control. It is not a good thing that American merchants and manufacturers should have to send their goods and letters to South American via Europe if they wish security and dispatch. Even on the Pacific, where our ships have held their own better than on the Atlantic, our merchant flag is now threatened through the liberal aid bestowed by other governments on their own steam lines. I ask your earnest consideration of the report with which the Merchant Marine Commission has followed its long and careful inquiry."

The Senate has duly considered the report of the President's Commission, and under the leadership of Senator GALLINGER, chairman of the Commission, has passed the bill and sent it to the House of Representatives.

Now the House has in turn its opportunity and its duty to heed the counsel and fulfill the appeals of Harrison, McKinley, and Roosevelt.

Now, let us see what Iowa says, for Iowa cuts an important figure in this country, and especially do we place great confidence in the intelligence and patriotism of her senior Senator. He is a representative man of the whole country. His vision of statesmanship and statecraft is not limited by the production of a single State or the ideas of a single community, and the same may be said of the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, an Iowa man. I give the following as the true position of Iowa upon the shipping bill:

IOWA AND THE SHIPPING BILL.

On February 14, 1906, the United States Senate passed, by a vote of 38 to 27, a shipping bill, "To promote the national defense, to create a naval reserve, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, and to promote commerce."

There are four important points regarding this bill, which the people of Iowa and other Middle Western States should bear in mind:

1. That it is not the bill that was before Congress several years ago, but a wholly new and radically different measure.

2. That this present bill was framed by a special Commission of Senators and Representatives, seven out of ten of whom were from Western and Southern States—a Commission created by Congress on the urgent recommendation of President Roosevelt, who approves this bill as wise and effective and asks prompt consideration of it by the the House of Representatives.

3. That Hon. Leslie M. Shaw, of Iowa, Secretary of the Treasury, has for years been an eloquent champion of the establishment of American steamship lines to foreign lands, especially to the markets of South America—and this bill duly reflects the results of the Secretary's emphatic arguments.

4. That Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON, senior Senator from Iowa, who voted against the former shipping bill, voted for this present bill, after closely examining its details and procuring certain perfecting amendments.

On August 2, 1899, the Republican State platform of Iowa said:

"That, for the national defense, for the reenforcement of the Navy, for the enlargement of our foreign markets, for the employment of American workingmen, in the mines, forests, farms, mills, factories, and shipyards, we favor the enactment of legislation which will regain for American ships the carrying of our foreign commerce."

Here is a frank, authoritative declaration that Iowa favors the upbuilding of the American merchant marine—provided, of course, that the proposed legislation is fair to all interests and directed in the proper way to the proper results.

SECRETARY SHAW'S ARGUMENT.

Secretary Shaw, in his address before the American Bankers' Association on October 10, 1905—just before the association formally indorsed this shipping bill—said:

"The markets of South America, South Africa, and the adjacent islands are just being developed. The eyes of the world are upon them. The merchant nations of Europe know where they are located, and they are establishing banks and warehouses within them, and they have already established regular and fast lines of steamers to them. The United States has neither banks nor commission houses nor warehouses in these ports, nor has it means of communication with them except through old, worn-out, dilapidated ships, sailing under foreign flags and making 8 or 10 knots an hour.

* * * * * * *

"Iowa was dotted with settlements long before railroads tapped the territory. In those days some grain was grown, and the little that was grown was hauled in wagons, frequently a hundred miles and sometimes more. A few cattle were fattened, and they were driven sometimes 400 miles to market. There were trails then and sometimes roads. Some hogs were fattened. They were killed, their carcasses frozen and hauled to market, a process which consumed sometimes weeks and frequently entailed an expense exceeding the value of the freight carried. But in those days Iowa did not contribute very much either to interstate or to international commerce. Not until railroads, encouraged by Government aid, were built did her commerce multiply, and not until these became of the best did she take rank and contribute abundantly."

SENATOR ALLISON'S VIEW.

Senator ALLISON, in an address at Clinton on October 10, 1903, thus expressed his own opinion and the sentiment of his State as to the especial objects which ought to be sought in the restoration of American shipping for the expansion of American commerce:

"Our efforts should be turned to these countries lying near us, as well as to South America and Asia. The latter field is likely to be of inestimable value in the near future, stimulated as it has been by the presence of our flag in those distant seas where three-fifths of the population of the globe is to be supplied in the future with the products of the more civilized nations.

"In this struggle we will have the active and close competition of Europe. We have advantage in distance and will soon have, if we have not now, the advantage of facilities. American ships must float there, and the American flag must be seen there and dwell there, and our Government can well afford to provide especial aid to our merchant marine to extend our trade there and in South Africa and South America as well."

President Roosevelt's Commission, in the framing of the bill which has passed the Senate and now comes before the House, has followed very closely the judgment of Iowa's Secretary of the Treasury and Iowa's distingnished senior Senator, for every one of the most important new ocean mail lines provided for in this bill runs to the ports of either Asia, South Africa, or South America.

ALL FOR TRADE LINES.

In sharp contrast with previous propositions, this bill does not give a single dollar to create new lines of fast passenger ships to Europe.

It aims altogether to provide special shipping facilities where no regular American lines and no regular and efficient foreign lines now exist to develop and expand American trade with Cuba, Mexico, Central America, Brazil, Argentina, South Africa, China, Japan, and the Philippines, with one line in the Atlantic and one in the Pacific to the Isthmus of Panama.

Only one existing line of contract mail steamers is given increased compensation by this bill, and that is a western line, from San Francisco to Australia, which is underpaid and will succumb unless this aid is granted. This American mail service has been instrumental in increasing our exports to Australia from $12,000,000 in 1896 to $27,000,000 in 1904. If the line should fail, most of this trade would go to Canada and Europe.

The mail compensation of every other existing contract line, however, is left absolutely unchanged. Altogether, the new mail lines proposed in the bill call for a maximum annual expenditure of about $3,000,000, or a much smaller sum than is paid in mail subsidies by Great Britain or France—smaller even than by Japan. However, expert ship merchants declared that on these particular routes the proposed payments, with rigid economy and enterprise, will be sufficient for the purpose.

FOR "DELIVERY-WAGON" SHIPS.

Besides the mail subventions to new lines, the bill provides for a separate subvention at the rate of $5 a gross ton a year for all cargo vessels above 1,000 tons if steam and 200 tons if sail, and for the vessels of the deep-sea fisheries. This provision as to cargo vessels was inserted largely because of the vigorous criticism of the shipping bill of a few years ago, in the Middle West, that it gave too much heed to fast steamers and too little to the "delivery-wagon" type of ship, slow, capacious, economical, and especially important for the export of grain, provisions, cattle, and other bulky western products.

The present bill grants subventions to all cargo vessels fit for ocean carrying, without any premium whatever upon speed. This gives a fair chance to new builders and owners of moderate means, and will develop a fleet of vessels of especial value to the export trade of Iowa and the Mississippi Valley.

Moreover, instead of magnifying the importance of the great port of New York, this bill expressly requires that six of the nine Atlantic Ocean lines shall start from the South Atlantic ports or the Gulf of Mexico, thus widely distributing the new shipping facilities and guaranteeing to the farmers and other producers of Iowa and the Middle West the advantage of competitive routes by rail and sea for their exports to the West Indies and South America.

In response to the suggestion of the President and the desire of the Navy Department, a naval reserve is authorized, not to exceed 10,000 officers and men, to be enrolled from the merchant marine and trained in gunnery, etc. This naval reserve will receive retainers and will serve afloat in war.

NOT A BILL FOR MONOPOLY.

Here are some more points to remember as to this shipping bill:

1. That the Standard Oil and other great corporations exporting their own products in their own ships are shut out by the requirement that all vessels receiving subventions shall be "exclusively common carriers for the service of the public."

2. That the Atlantic steamship trust is excluded, because all but 10 of its 130 steamers are foreign-built vessels under foreign flags, while these subventions are payable only to vessels "hereafter built and registered in the United States or now duly registered."

3. That vessels receiving subventions must ply in the foreign trade of the United States, and lose the subventions if diverted to the trade of other nations.

4. That no part of these subventions can be absorbed by the steel trust, because not only steel but everything needed for the construction, equipment, or repair of American vessels in the foreign trade—the only trade to which these subventions apply—can be imported and used without a cent of duty. (Sections 12 and 13 of the free list of the Dingley tariff.)

WHAT THE PRESIDENT SAYS.

These are some of the facts which show why this shipping bill and the work of the Merchant Marine Commission have the cordial approval of President Roosevelt, who said in his message to the present Congress:

"To the spread of our trade in peace and the defense of our flag in war a great and prosperous merchant marine is indispensable. We should have ships of our own and seamen of our own to convey our goods to neutral markets and in case of need to reenforce our battle line. It can not but be a source of regret and uneasiness to us that the lines of communication with our sister republics of South America should be chiefly under foreign control. It is not a good thing that American merchants and manufacturers should have to send their goods and letters to South America via Europe if they wish security and dispatch. Even on the Pacific, where our ships have held their own better than on the Atlantic, our merchant flag is now threatened through the liberal aid bestowed by other governments on their own steam lines. I ask your earnest consideration of the report with which the Merchant Marine Commission has followed its long and careful inquiry."

The Senate has considered the report and passed the bill. Now the President awaits like action by the House of Representatives.

THE NEWSPAPERS FOR AMERICAN SHIPS.

But it is said by some people that for some reason the press of the country is against the shipping proposition. Is that true? The partisan Democratic press, whether located in Washington or elsewhere, is of course against it, because the creation of a merchant marine that would be an honor to the country and be profitable to the people would be a stroke of wisdom that would tend to the great advantage of the party that would enact it. Nobody doubts that. But, let us see. I give here extracts from representative newspapers of the whole country, and particularly of the great Middle West. They come from Republican, Democratic, and independent newspapers. They speak volumes for the public sentiment that is rapidly crystallizing, and which will be followed by an ocean tide before this matter is at an end. Here they are:

THE SUBSIDY BILL.

[New York Daily Tribune, February 16, 1906.]

The ship-subsidy bill passed by the Senate on Wednesday by a vote of 38 to 27 is, we think, the most commendable measure of this character presented in recent years in either branch of Congress. The framers of the bill have shown an open-mindedness in meeting objections raised to details of their plan for resuscitating the American merchant marine which has gone a long way toward conciliating opposition. It is a noteworthy advance in legislation of this sort to find Republicans and Democrats cooperating to improve and strengthen a measure which a year or two ago would have been assailed and defended with partisan intensity. The bill as drawn by the joint commission which investigated conditions in the ocean carrying trade has been amended in many particulars, and Democratic Senators who dissented from the subsidy principle and who voted against the measure as a whole were helpful in securing amendments of a nature to allay the local and sectional prejudices which have hitherto defeated ship-subsidy legislation.

The House of Representatives has been rather disinclined to join the Senate in an attempt to stimulate American shipping, because it has balked at the outlay involved and because it has believed that the time was not ripe for a campaign for deep-sea supremacy. It has been content to see American energy and capital devoted to the more pressing work of internal development. It has seemed to the leaders in the House that until this work was accomplished and we were economically ready to compete for mastery in the ocean carrying trade it was useless to experiment with the European system of bounties. The House is dominated by western and southern sentiment, and in those two sections there has been a deeply rooted feeling that subsidies would merely be a sop thrown to the shipping interests of the Atlantic seaboard, operating neither to reduce freight rates on the commodities we send abroad nor to open to the producers of the interior any new and profitable foreign markets. In the last few years that feeling has been greatly modified, and the West and South are beginning to see that important national interests may be served by the creation of an American merchant marine. Through the agency of ocean transportation lines new foreign territory would be opened to our commerce and our whole foreign trade enlarged and stimulated. This trade has been doubled in the last ten years, and at the rate of progress which the last decade has shown, the United States will soon become the foremost buyer and seller in the world's markets. Priority as a trading nation must involve, sooner or later, supremacy in the world's carrying trade, and American opinion is now running strongly toward an assertion through legislation of our purpose to recreate and maintain a merchant marine. The House of Representatives may not yield this year to that opinion, but it is evident that the experiment of expansion through subsidies can not be long delayed.

The Senate bill of this year contains, besides, a feature which strengthens it enormously as compared with earlier bills. It would create a naval reserve from the crews of the ships entitled to subventions and enroll for four years a force of not more than 10,000 men who could be drafted into the Navy in case of war. The vessels receiving aid are also to be put at the Government's disposal for military purposes, so that the national defense would be materially strengthened at a very vital point through the moderate expenditure—perhaps $3,000,000 a year for the first five or ten years—which the bill authorizes. The protection thus afforded would not be dear at such a price.

THE AMERICAN SHIP.

[New York Sun, February 8, 1906.]

Why should Senators waste time over the question whether the Gallinger bill for the restoration of the American ship to its old place on the ocean is a subsidy or a bounty, or a measure analogous to the land-reclamation act, or what not?

Open the way for the American flag to its proper place at the front of the world's carrying trade, and call it a subsidy or by any other name.

Redeem our now one great national failure, and call the redemption fee a bounty or by any other name.

Rehabilitate the American merchant marine, and compare the process to the land-reclamation legislation or to anything else in sight.

The people are not afraid of the word "subsidy," or of any other word that may be used to describe the method of assuring that restoration and revival which President Roosevelt had in view when he said to Congress: "To the spread of our trade in peace and the defense of our flag in war a great and prosperous merchant marine is indispensable. We should have ships of our own and seamen of our own to convey our goods to neutral markets, and in case of need to reenforce our battle line."

Let us have them. Let the lack of them no longer disgrace this nation.

FLY THE FLAG AGAIN!

[New York Mail and Express, February 15, 1906.]

A bill to protect the American merchant marine—to create it by protecting it, and to put the Stars and Stripes once more where they belong—has at last passed the United States Senate.

It is not a bill to favor the aristocracy of ocean commerce—the greyhounds plying to the leading European ports—but to build up what Senator Gallinger has called "the hard-working cargo ships, the democracy of the ocean," and fly the flags upon them. It establishes, by the help of reasonable subventions for carrying the mails, thirteen new contract mail lines to South and Central America, Africa, and Asia, and by the general subvention at the rate of $5 per gross ton to cargo carriers in the foreign trade provides encouragement for commerce in general to foreign ports.

But the bill passed yesterday is more than a bill to build up our foreign commerce, which for years has been abandoned to foreign vessels, chiefly British. It is a measure for the national defense. It provides for a force of 10,000 trained American naval volunteers, all to be seamen or officers on board the aided ships, and all immediately available as sailors in the Navy in case of war. It adds a tonnage of some 300,000 in steel mail ships to our auxiliary navy in time of war. Incidentally, of course, it will provide a constant reserve of American sailors to be drawn upon through voluntary enlistment as seamen for the Navy.

The passage of this measure ought to bring joy and hope in our own country, and would surely do so if the people were sure of its passage by the other branch of Congress. One thing is certain—we shall never have a merchant marine without such a measure. Aye, another thing is certain, too—we are building the Panama Canal at a possible cost of $300,000,000 for the benefit of Britishers, if we do not enact this bill or one substantially like it.

PASS THE SHIPPING BILL!

[Baltimore American, February 13, 1906.]

For more than forty years the United States has been without an ocean-traversing merchant marine. The half dozen vessels which have from time to time borne the American commerce flag to foreign ports have served merely to accentuate the helpless condition of American commerce. This was not always so. A decade before the disappearance of American ships the United States had the largest merchant marine in the world. It has been sometimes argued that the ownership of vessels had little effect on trade. There are ports in the United States to-day which tell a different tale. They can call to mind great volumes of trade carried in native vessels which disappeared along with the disappearance of those vessels. Nor is it singular that the owners of vessels should seek to benefit their own rather remote ports. Their associations, interests, and schemes are bound closely to their own homes, and they are less likely to perceive profit in the use of their ships elsewhere.

The condition of the American merchant marine is simply deplorable. Many suggestions have been made and plans proposed, and once or twice Congress has made little essays of piddling character to remedy the evil. The scheme that will be disposed of in the Senate this week is the only one which has promised substantial results. It will actually help to build up a merchant marine. It is this fact that demands support for it. It is very easy and quite a Congressional failing to say that this, that, or the other is not the best way, and some other way ought to be adopted; but the situation is, that after many years of investigation and effort to accomplish something, this is the only way which has been seriously suggested, and this way promises to achieve the purpose, so far as it goes.

If an American merchant marine is wanted—and there is a very general demand for it—this is the only possible way of getting it. There is another consideration besides the desirability of carrying American trade in American ships. It ought not to be difficult to perceive that conditions might arise when the whole foreign trade of the United States would be paralyzed if there were no American ships in which to carry it. With the present neutrality laws interpreted as they were a year ago, a general European war would place this country in a very embarrassing position, unless she had an abundant supply of her own ships. But there is a great trade immediately at hand and only waiting the carrying facilities of a merchant marine. It is this trade, among other things, which the merchant marine, or shipping, bill proposes to develop. It naturally and logically belongs to the United States, and will come here if American ships are encouraged to bring it.

AMERICAN SHIPS.

[Troy, N. Y., Times, February 15, 1906.]

A very important step in the movement for the rehabilitation of the American mercantile marine was taken yesterday when the Senate passed the ship-subsidy bill. This measure was introduced as the result of extended and painstaking inquiry, covering every possible point at issue, conducted by the Merchant Marine Commission, created by Congress at the suggestion of President Roosevelt; and it is safe to say that no subject was ever brought up in the legislative branch of the Government which had behind it a more comprehensive array of facts or more forceful arguments based on conditions disclosed by the investigation. The discussion of the matter has been particularly earnest and enlightening, and the bill passed the Senate indorsed by the ripest wisdom of that body, as well as the hearty approval of intelligent and impartial public opinion.

It was inevitable that there should be wide differences of sentiment as to the detailed provisions of such a measure. Senator GALLINGER, the chairman of the Mercantile Marine Commission and the custodian of the bill, himself has admitted that the bill was not in all respects what he would have it; but diverse views had to be recognized and harmonized, and so long as the main object sought bade fair to be accomplished, minor considerations were ignored. The bill was passed after many amendments had been offered and accepted, most of them such as met the approval of the Commission and of friends of American shipping generally. In the shape in which it leaves the Senate it promises much in the way of furthering American commercial interests, and may be a powerful instrumentality for removing the reproach under which this nation, the largest exporter of the world, has so long sufferred because in the matter of ocean freight carrying it has left itself at the mercy of foreign rivals.

The bill contemplates the establishment of thirteen new contract mail lines to run from Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific ports to South and Central America, and various places in Australia, Asia, and elsewhere, with such subventions as shall encourage the investment of capital in enterprises of this character and tend to open up trade for American producers. It is also the purpose to create a naval reserve force of 10,000 officers and men, to be available for national service in the event of any emergency requiring such assistance. Various provisions are designed with a view to develop the ocean marine of the country to proportions adequate to the great and growing needs. The aid to be given is not extravagant. The total outlay under the terms of the bill is estimated at not more than $5,000,000 annually, and this sum, measured by the liberality of other governments to their shipping, is very moderate. England, which loses no opportunity to help its shipping, not long since contributed no less than $13,000,000 toward the improvement and enlargement of one line of vessels.

The shipping bill is yet to pass the House of Representatives; but there is every reason to hope that the same spirit of practical and patriotic regard for the country's interests which moved the Senate to approval will find a like expression in the popular body. The bill should become a law.

THE ONLY UNPROTECTED AMERICAN INDUSTRY.

[Rochester, N. Y., Democrat, January 25, 1906.]

The fact that the United States has, so far, neglected and refused to encourage the industry of shipping in this country by a system of subsidies is curiously out of harmony with the general policy of the nation under which the country has prospered greatly, and to which the dominant party in control of the Government stands equally committed—the policy of protection for American industries.

Shipbuilding is the only unprotected American industry. That, in a nutshell, is why it is the only languishing American industry. This discrimination is entirely unreasonable and results from a mere accident. A ship is a technically unimportable manufactured article. That is to say, you can't land a ship and pass it through the custom-house. Consequently you can't collect a tariff by the ordinary methods on this peculiar form of manufactured article, and can't protect in the usual fashion the American industry of manufacturing this one article—a ship. Is this a good, sane reason for leaving this one American industry to go to ruin for lack of the protection that every other American industry enjoys? It certainly is not, as long as there are entirely obvious and entirely unobjectionable means, other than the protective tariff on ships, for accomplishing the same results.

Apart from the entirely sentimental and senseless objection to "subsidies," which is an objection not to any fact, but to a mere word, there is no argument against the protection of the shipbuilding industry that does not equally apply to the protection of every other American industry. If the American industry of making shoes ought to be protected, the American industry of making ships ought to be protected. If the American shipbuilding industry ought not to be protected, no American industry ought to be protected. Apart from the upbuilding of an American mercantile navy and the inevitable consequent advantages to the American war Navy, the result of protecting the American shipbuilding industry would be the proved result of protecting other American industries, an increase of the home market for American raw material and American labor, the stimulation of other American industries by an addition to the list of gainful occupations for the citizens of this country, an increase of wages all along the line, and an increase of the general prosperity.

MUST MEET OUR RIVALS.

[Pittsburg, Pa., Gazette, February 15, 1906.]

Another fair start has been made toward encouragement of the American merchant marine. The bill of Senator JACOB H. GALLINGER, of New Hampshire, passed the Senate finally yesterday, after a sharp debate. The bill provides for eleven new mail subsidies and other remuneration for American vessels in the foreign trade, and makes the ships affected auxiliaries of the American Navy.

There may be some honest difference of opinion affecting the details of this measure, but it is unquestionable if this country desires to see its flag in the general commerce of the world, it must meet the competition of other nations in giving rewards. The merchant vessels of Great Britain, Germany, and France are notoriously subsidized by those Governments. They must have reasons beyond mere national pride for expending large sums in this way. They profit greatly from the commerce; their producers are given advantages in the marketing of their wares.

As matters stand at present "America pays the freight." On exports and imports America is dissipating a goodly share of its "favorable balance of trade" in the enrichment of foreign shipping interests.

IF THERE WERE A SERIOUS WAR.

[From the New York Evening Sun, January 16, 1906.]

We have a fine Navy, second to none in effectiveness per unit, and we have an Army of about 60,000 men which is one of the best, if not the best, in the world; but in the event of war we should not be able to draft enough vessels from our merchant marine to transport this small Army over the seas. Including the fast Atlantic liners, there are only fifty-seven seagoing American ships of 4,000 gross tons and upward. The Atlantic liners would have to be employed for scouting purposes in a really serious war, and a good many of the other vessels in the list would not be suitable for transports. In fact, only seventeen of them correspond to the requirements named in a report made by the General Staff to Secretary Taft.

A military transport should be of 5,500 to 6,500 tons register, and have a speed of 12 knots and a capacity for a tactical unit of troops—infantry, cavalry, engineers, and artillery and their supplies. If there were a hurry call for two divisions (three brigades each) for service in the East, it could not be met. To transport such a body of troops, which in Europe would not be considered much of an army, twenty of the 6,500-ton and eighteen of the 5,500-ton ships would be required. We don't possess them as a nation, and could not lay our hands upon them. "The quick first blow," says Secretary Taft, replying to a requisition for the facts from Senator GALLINGER, who has charge of the ship-subsidy bill, "can not be struck at all, nor can an expedition of any greater size be embarked without delay except by the use of foreign vessels. And in war these foreign vessels can not be acquired without evasion or infraction of the neutrality laws."

Of course our impotence has not been lost on such nations as might be involved in war with us—Germany, for instance, in Europe, and Japan, in Asia. The General Staff, whose business it is to consider ways and means, and not to assume that we shall never be at war with any of our commercial and political rivals, recommends that "to provide suitable ships for a rapid movement of two divisions from either coast there should be not less than 60 of the larger and 54 of the smaller size afloat in Atlantic and the same in Pacific waters, or 120 of the larger and 108 of the smaller size in all—an aggregate of 228 vessels."

It is now admitted (nearly eight years after) that only propitious weather saved our Cuban expedition, shipped around Cape Maisi in marine odds and ends, from disaster. "A severe storm," says the general Staff, "would have scattered the fleet, probably with great loss of life, and would have defeated the object of the expedition. There was nothing except the successful arrival to justify the departure." And of that pick-up fleet of transports it is now said that no board of health would have passed it. Ventilation for the crowded soldiers there was practically none, and the sanitary arrangements were a makeshift.

So it comes to this: The United States could not make war with land forces, except on a very small scale, and would have to rely mainly upon the Navy. But we can not expect war to be made to suit our deficiencies. In drawing attention to the condition of our transport service, which for a great and sudden need might as well be zero as the sorry array of nondescripts that could be drummed up, Senator GALLINGER has driven home a powerful argument for his ship-subsidy bill.

THE NEW MERCHANT MARINE BILL.

[St. Paul, Minn., Pioneer-Press, January 7, 1905.]

The bill for the encouragement of the merchant marine, offered by the special commission that devoted a large part of the summer to hearings on the subject, will undoubtedly receive more general indorsement than any other recent ship-subsidy measures. It is based on an entirely different principle, seeks different objects, and apparently would not put great demands on the Treasury. The Hanna-Frye measures, with their ascending scales of mileage subsidies based on speed and tonnage, were intended to put a premium on the building of fast ocean greyhounds and their registry under our flag. Only moderate subsidies would have gone to the ordinary freighter. They would neither have encouraged the establishment of new lines, promoted access to new markets, nor created new mail routes, and only indirectly have supplied men to the Navy. About their only justification was that the fast vessels encouraged by them could have been utilized as auxiliary cruisers, as the Paris and New York were in our war with Spain.

Manifestly, the purpose of this measure is to encourage the training of seamen, their enlistment as volunteers of the Navy, the establishment of new mail routes, and the opening of direct trades with certain ports. The present mail subventions are not interfered with or increased. The only subsidy feature is the $5 per gross ton subvention, a rate that would give a 20,000-ton vessel complying with the requirements a maximum of $100,000 a year and a 5,000-ton vessel $25,000. On the basis of actual tonnage now registered it is estimated that subventions the first year would cost $2,394,000 more.

Apparently the only reasonable criticism of the measure on the part of those who believe that some form of assistance is necessary to equalize the cost of operating vessels under American and foreign flags is that no limit, beyond the ten-year limit, has been fixed. Since it is not known how rapidly the receipts from tonnage duties will grow or how rapid this measure will stimulate American registry, it would seem sounder policy to limit the maximum to be expended in any one year. The Hanna-Frye bill had this saving grace.

Since this measure probably avoids the objections of the Republican minority that looked upon the Hanna-Frye bill as a sort of grab by the strong and well-established steamship lines, it is likely to pass if there is time for considering it.

THE HONEST SHIPPING BILL.

[Milwaukee Wisconsin, January 11, 1905.]

From a source near to the Republican majority of the Merchant Marine Commission it is learned that the reason why the plan of discriminating duties was given up was not fear of retaliation or of difficulties about the treaties, but realization that to make the plan effective in the direct trade the free list would have to be abolished. Forty-three per cent in value and 60 to 70 per cent in bulk of the imports into the United States are now free; 98 per cent from Brazil and about 90 per cent from South America generally. These free articles include tea, coffee, and miscellaneous foods and many indispensable food materials. The Republican Commissioners, and some of the Democrats, were opposed to making these imports dutiable, as would be necessitated by the adoption of the discriminating-duty principle. Even the three Democrats who signed the minority report suggesting discriminating duty have no enthusiasm for that solution.

With discriminating duties set aside, there was no recourse but in some form of subvention. The Commission has endeavored to frame a bill that will be fair to all interests and all sections. The keynote of the measure is the cargo ships, and an even subvention, based on the naval-reserve principle, of $5 per gross registered ton, steam or sail, is fair to all vessels. Differing from the Frye-Hanna bill, the present plan sets no premium on speed. It abandons the "greyhound" idea, and the highest requirement which it imposes on the ten mail routes is the moderate one of 16 knots. It is evident, on a survey of the provisions of the bill, that the Commission has paid heed to what it has heard during its tour of the West. The West has always held that if American shipping was subsidized the plan should be framed with a view of making new markets for American producers, so that the benefits of the policy would be shared by the whole country. The West has not cared for new lines to Europe, in which direction transportation is sufficient at the present time. Its desire has been for new lines to South America, the West Indies, South Africa, and Asia, and these are the only lines provided for in the Commission's bill.

There were objections to the Frye-Hanna bill from many who were in favor of encouragement to American shipping. The Commission's bill looks like an honest effort to meet the objectors to the earlier measure who are in favor of an earnest attempt to revise the American merchant marine.

THE MERCHANT MARINE BILL.

[Omaha, Nebr., Bee, December, 1905.]

There is every indication that the present Congress will earnestly consider the subject of building up an American merchant marine, and it is at least possible that there will be action looking to this. The joint commission appointed by the last Congress to inquire into the subject and submit its views to Congress has carried out the duty imposed upon it, and prepared a bill which will be submitted at the present session. This measure is one of the most comprehensive that have yet been framed for this purpose, and merits the careful consideration of Congress and the country.

The report submitted a few days ago by Senator GALLINGER states that the chief support which the shipping bill and the entire inquiry of the Merchant Marine Commission has received and are receiving has not come from shipowners or shipbuilders, or even from the people of the States adjacent to the ocean, but from the merchants and manufacturers interested in the export trade, and producers of the great interior. It is stated that manufacturers and merchants of the Western States who appeared before the Commission emphatically testified that they were baffled in their efforts to build up an export trade, especially to South America, by the arbitrary methods and irregular, inadequate service of the so-called "steamship companies" under foreign flags, which monopolize this ocean carrying. It is pointed out that many of these business men have themselves been to South America and have found that in order to visit or communicate with their foreign customers they had to go by way of Europe and its subsidized lines, thus crossing the Atlantic twice to reach their destination. In many instances, if the quickest delivery is desired, they have had to send their goods by the same circuitous way.

The report of the joint commission says: "Not only is an American ship itself the most efficient carrier of American commerce, but the officers of that ship, the American passengers who tread its deck, and particularly the American merchants who go out to represent the steamship company and to push its business, are inevitably pioneers and drummers of American trade in foreign lands." There can be no doubt in regard to this. Our South American trade is not increasing largely for the reason that our merchants and manufacturers are dependent upon foreign shipowners. In a late issue of Consular Reports several of the representatives of the United States in South American countries are quoted as saying that one of the essential conditions to the extension of our trade in that quarter of the world is the establishment of steamship lines to the southern ports. The United States minister to Chile says: "One of the greatest difficulties in the way of closer commercial connection between the United States and Chile is in the lack of good shipping facilities." American consuls at various places in South America make a similar report. There are other conditions necessary to secure trade, but transportation facilities is one of the most important. The question of creating a merchant marine for our foreign commerce will undoubtedly receive earnest attention in the present Congress, and there is probability of action on this very important subject.

SOMETHING MUST BE DONE.

[Lincoln, Nebr., Star, April 14, 1906.]

Interest in the ship-subsidy bill now in the hands of the House committee is getting warmer, and as the evidence comes in it would appear that this country is pressed hard against the wall both in the manufacture and running of ships, and that if this bill is not passed or some other relief accorded, we will entirely cease to build ships and to run them.

With all our natural products and skilled labor the yards are not able to keep going in competition with Europe, and with all our great and rapidly increasing trade with the world of Europe and Asia, other nations must be allowed to do the carrying and other flags be broken out to the breeze while ours is furled.

Yesterday the president of the Boston Steamship Company testified that unless the subsidy bill passed their five great steamships plying between the Pacific coast and Japan would have to go off that route, for his company is losing money in trying to compete with the subsidized British vessels and those Japanese subsidized ships.

The Boston company gets $12,000 per annum for carrying the mails, while the British have a subsidy of $291,000 and the Japanese, $230,000.

Mr. Loud, Congressman from California, stated that the Spreckels line between San Francisco and Australia was losing money and those ships were to be transferred to the Japanese unless the bill passed.

So much for the matter of running the ships, and the testimony is no less positive as to our losing the art of making ships.

Recently the veteran Edwin S. Cramps testified that while most of the material for shipbuilding could be bought almost as low here as abroad because such material came in free of duty, that the price of labor in this country was very much greater. And he further affirmed that the labor bill constituted two-thirds of the whole cost. He gave as an illustration the bids recently opened for a Standard Oil ship when the difference between the lowest American bid and the lowest foreign bid was more than $100,000, so the contract went abroad.

Another witness was Mr. Hanscom, of the great yards at New London, Conn. This company had constructed the two greatest ships ever built in this country, costing five millions each, now engaged between Puget Sound and China, but he testified that owing to the cost of labor the yards had to be idle for two years past. The same kind of evidence came from the great builder and operator, Mr. Sewall, of Bath, who said that for several years they had been building no ships and did not expect to get any contracts unless this bill passed.

The country is not more interested in war ships than merchantmen, indeed far less. While we are spending additional millions for the Navy, something will have to be done if we are to have any commerce for the Navy to protect.

A SELF-DEFENSE MEASURE.

[San Francisco, Cal., Call, January 20, 1906.]

Ambitious for mercantile expansion though America certainly is, the practical method of realizing the ambition has been neglected so long that the speech delivered by Chairman GALLINGER, of the Merchant Marine Commission, urging upon Congress the adoption of the shipping subsidy bill was much needed to awake the country from sleeping on its rights in regard to foreign commerce. The decades go by and our merchant marine continues to decay to an extent which proves some stimulus is necessary if that branch of our national greatness is to keep pace with the general progress. To let that element of the general progress flag will be not merely to lose the direct wealth of the carrying trade and the shipbuilding industry, but the partial paralysis of that will retard our whole career.

It is clear we can not hope to see vivified this part of national welfare without some activity of national care and well-planned method. Laissez-faire has been fully tested and found wanting. The method which the Merchant Marine Commission has been studying for a whole year is the remedy approved by the most competent judges, and Congress should enact it into law and so rescue what may metaphorically and almost literally be called our sinking ships.

The Commission's plan is not, as has been some time imagined, one of mere gratuity by means of subventions. A substantial return of value received will be required of the recipients of governmental assistance. The gain to the nation of 10,000 well-trained naval volunteers, of 300,000 of steel mail steamships, the fast transports, ammunition, supply and auxiliary ships, would be so invaluable in the event of war and, what is more, so inestimably of worth in preventing war by our evident preparedness to make the opposer beware of us, that it is absurd to haggle or hesitate about the price we pay for these benefits of subvention. Then the great increase of our trade—the Commission estimates it at 50 to 100 per cent—would aid all industry and scatter a profit among the whole people, and return so much indirect enrichment of the Government that the figures of it could not be calculated, though common sense declares them to be large.

Moreover, it is imperative as a self-defense measure, for all the other great nations are upbuilding their shipping interests by subsidy, and we must keep in line or be left helpless in either military or commercial wars.

THE FLAG ON THE SEAS.

[St. Louis, Mo., Globe-Democrat, February 15, 1906.]

The starry flag which five or six decades ago was almost as familiar to the maritime world as is the starry firmament has vanished from the sight of men outside this country. It is a stranger in our great seaports. A few ocean-going vessels fly it, but for every one ship in the harbors of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and the rest of the big ports which has the Stars and Stripes at its masthead there are dozens bearing the British, German, and other foreign ensigns. This is a rather humiliating state of things for us. We pay hundreds of millions of dollars every year to foreign shipowners, which should go into the pockets of American citizens. Many persons in this country would like once more to see the flag range as free as the winds and the tides across the world's waters. Those persons believe that the enactment of the Senate's shipping bill would bring back that spectacle.

OUR MERCHANT MARINE.

[Cincinnati, Ohio, Enquirer, January 14, 1906.]

However widely opinion may differ as to the cause and remedy, everyone agrees that the condition of our merchant marine is deplorable, and a reproach to the great commercial nation which leads the world in the extent of its coast line and the volume of its foreign trade. Standing at the head in these respects we are so low down on the list of countries whose flag is seen in the marts of the world as to hardly make it worth counting. The great trading ports swarm with ships of almost every nationality but ours. Since the civil war a generation has grown up which does not fully realize the cause of this. Up to that time we had no competitor as carriers save Great Britain, and the sails of our unrivaled clippers whitened every sea. Taking advantage of the civil war, England fitted out a fleet of fast cruisers, transferred them to the Confederate States, and drove us off the ocean, substituting her own ships for ours on every route of trade. From that blow we have never recovered, and never can without some kind of legislation. Our registered foreign tonnage in 1810 was 100,000 greater than it is now. * * *

Our one great national failure is in the ocean carrying trade. The Merchant Marine Commission has, after careful study, recommended a scheme providing for mail subvention, which will involve an expenditure of $40,000,000 in the next ten years, and will, it is believed, give us back our place on the high seas. Three times that will be spent on irrigation in that period, and we hope Congress will consider the plan carefully before turning it down on fine-spun economic or political theories.

TRADE FOLLOWS THE FLAG.

[Denver, Colo., Republican, February 16, 1906.]

The passage by the Senate of the ship-subsidy bill forecasts its probable passage by the House. It is in line with the policy approved by some of the most experienced men interested in our foreign shipping who have given the subject attention, and since it also is in harmony with the principle of protection to home industries, there is every reason to believe that it will both become a law and result in great good.

The fact that the American people pay $200,000,000 every year to foreign shipowners and ship companies for the transportation of our foreign commerce demands the enactment of a law like the one contemplated in this bill. The appropriations in aid of steamship lines aggregate only $3,000,000, which must be contrasted with the $200,000,000 now paid to foreign shipowners, if we would form an idea of the value of the new policy to this country.

Trade follows the flag, and if we would extend our exports to new markets or enlarge our trade in those already open to our products, we must increase the facilities for transportation. So long as American manufactures have to be conveyed under a foreign flag, they will compete at a disadvantage with commodities of the same class produced in other countries.

AMERICA MUST KEEP PACE.

[St. Louis, Mo., Gazette, February 18, 1906.]

The time has come when the American merchant marine must be strengthened and enlarged, if this country is to keep pace with the other great nations of the world in the extension and expansion of trade in other lands. Last week the United States Senate passed a bill providing for substantial encouragement and support for the American merchant marine, and if the lower House of Congress is alive to its duty it will ratify the action of the Senate and pass the measure on to President Roosevelt, whose attitude of friendliness toward it is both well and widely understood.

Usually abreast of the other great trade and industrial nations in everything of a progressive character, the United States has been most stupidly negligent in the strengthening and upbuilding of its fleets of commerce. Both England and Germany have been able to establish and maintain profitable trade relations in territory naturally tributary to the United States, for no reason than that they have fostered their merchant marine, while our own nation has persisted in a policy of stolid indifference to this, the one indispensable means for the successful carrying on of commerce with the countries over the seas.

FOR AMERICAN SHIPS.

[Omaha, Nebr., Bee, January 15, 1906.]

It appears probable that at the present session of Congress there will be action on the bill now before the Senate providing for an American merchant marine in the ocean carrying trade. It said that the indications are favorable to the passage of this measure, which is understood to have the approval of President Roosevelt and of the Republican leaders in both branches of Congress. The bill accords with the report of the Merchant Marine Commission. * * *

The adoption of the policy contemplated in the measure before the Senate would give a tremendous stimulus to American shipbuilding, and this would be felt in numerous other industries. There can be no doubt that if given such encouragement as the pending bill provides for, the shipbuilding industry of the United States would within ten years equal and perhaps surpass that of Great Britain, giving employment to a vast army of well-paid labor. Undoubtedly public sentiment is more favorable to the promotion of an American merchant marine than it has been before since our shipping was driven from the seas.

A MATTER OF BUSINESS.

[Davenport, Iowa, Times, February 10, 1906.]

One of the most important bills that will come up in Congress this year is the shipping bill. A disposition seems to be manifested to avoid as much as possible calling it a "ship subsidy bill." The subsidy idea has some opponents. But that the American flag ought to be placed upon more merchant vessels on the seas is admitted by all those who have traveled very much, for they have been compelled to blush at the great ports of the world to see the flags of every other nation upon the shipping in the harbors, while the Stars and Stripes could be found only over the door of some back-street consulate. Of course, the American war ships make other nations familiar with the American flag, but not to the extent that merchant shipping would do it. It is not a matter of sentiment so much as a matter of business that makes the shipping bill appeal to those who have been globe trotters.

WHERE DO YOU STAND?

[Winona, Minn., Republican, February 17, 1906.]

To remedy this unfortunate state of affairs—which is a national shame—the Senate has passed a shipping bill, and it now goes to the House for consideration. If the bill passes the House in its present shape, about $8,000,000 is placed at the disposal of the Government the first year, a small sum, but experts believe it will be the foundation for a shipping which will again carry the flag through all the world's seas. France yesterday adopted a similar measure, and Germany and England, the great commercial rivals, are both aiding by subsidies their merchant marine. The question now is, Will the United States pursue the same broad national policy, or will it continue to have even American mails carried on foreign ships? Where do you stand?

WHOLE COUNTRY TO BENEFIT.

[State Capitol, Guthrie, Okla., February 17, 1906.]

The passage of the ship-subsidy bill by the Senate should be a source of gratification to the people of Oklahoma and the interior States, as well as those along the seaboard. Senators from the Middle West in some instances opposed the bill on the ground that it was legislation for special interests, but this view may well be regarded as a mistaken one. The shipping companies will, of course, benefit more directly and the good effects upon their prosperity may be more easily seen, but the beneficial results upon the whole country is just as certain.

The United States is the greatest consuming and producing nation of the world. It has been for years a matter of regret and a cause for humiliation that our great foreign commerce has been carried in foreign bottoms, but in the depleted state of American shipping there has also been a national danger. Should this country be drawn into a war, it would be necessary to enter foreign markets to secure suitable ships for transport service and fast ocean liners that might be converted into war vessels. To secure sailors to man these auxiliary cruisers would be another serious problem.

For patriotic reasons, then, a subsidy that would provide the proper stimulant to create anew the old interest and pride in American shipping is a vital need.

Yet there are industrial reasons also. Oklahoma farmers produce wheat and meats for export. Oklahoma mills make flour for European ports. As it is with Oklahoma, so it is with many of the States. The prosperity of our shipping will bring about a better condition in our foreign trade. Those interests and those sections of the country that engage directly or indirectly in the export business will benefit by the subsidy bill. The want of American bottoms has been largely responsible for our failure to secure the greater part of the South American trade, as is our natural right.

The passage of the subsidy bill, the activity of Secretary Root in trying to get his Department on a basis where it can open up new foreign markets, and the investigations with a view of assisting exporters, carried on by the Department of Agriculture, are things that will entail improved conditions throughout the whole country. Primarily the ship-subsidy measure is not class legislation in any sense of the word. The bill is a patriotic one, but also has good sound business reasons for its being.

EVERY OTHER PLAN HAS FAILED.

[Dayton, Ohio, Journal, February 16, 1906.]

The Senate is to be congratulated on having passed the ship-subsidy bill in spite of all the irrational clamor which has resounded over the word "subsidy.' This word is not necessarily bad; it is bad only when it is applied to a grant for an unjust purpose or when it is misdirected. When the purpose is proper and the aid is correctly and honestly given where it is due the word is without any sinister meaning.

Every other plan for restoring the American merchant marine has been tried. The United States has had practical free trade invariably coupled with disaster. Its people have bought foreign ships without finding that the American flag means commercial prosperity. It has used the trading ships of other nations, and it knows that the profit has gone anywhere except into the pockets of its own people. * * *

Subsidies have hitherto been tried for the American marine only in a partial and half-hearted way. But the thing works with other nations. It keeps the Cunarders prosperous for Great Britain and it keeps Hamburg and Bremen busy in Germany. It has kept an American line on the Pacific in spite of all discouragements, and it is helping to make Japan the mistress of oriental trade.

PROTECT THE SHIP.

[Toledo, Ohio, Blade, February 15, 1906.]

The bill extending the principle of protection to the American merchant marine was yesterday passed by the Senate, and the hope of the late Senator Hanna and his coworkers is nearer realization than ever before. Under the provisions of the bill subventions are granted to 13 new contract mail lines and a naval reserve force of 10,000 men is created. * * *

The object of the present bill is to encourage Americans to invest in the ocean carrying trade by meeting English competition. Only by subventions can this result be attained. By offering inducements there is no reason why a very considerable part of our mammoth commerce would not be carried in American bottoms, built by American workingmen, and manned by American sailors. These merchant ships will likewise increase the efficiency of our national defense, and the provision for supporting a naval reserve has this object especially in view.

Friends of the measure should not relax their efforts because the Senate has acted favorably upon it. The disposition of the House is uncertain. There is a strong opposition to it and its enemies are ever alert. But all Americans who believe in the principle of protection, every workingman who appreciates the advantages which the creation of a great industry brings to him, should give the bill active support. President Roosevelt has encouraged the measure because he sees in its application added glory to the country.

GIVE US AMERICAN SHIPS.

[From the Louisville, Ky., Herald.]

Emphatically opposed to a shipping trust, the Herald is, nevertheless, in favor of some scheme or system whereby American trade may be transported in American bottoms on every sea and to every port in the world. We oppose Government ownership of railways. We could not view with approval governmental acquisition of shipping lines. But as American trade at home is built up by the tariff, which prevents foreign competition with home-made goods of as good or better quality, there can be no violation of sound economics in building up, by some constructive legislation, an effective system of American shipping. President Roosevelt sums up this phase of the case of American against foreign industry very succintly: "From every standpoint it is unwise for the United States to continue to rely upon the ships of competing nations for the distribution of our goods. It should be made advantageous to carry American goods in American-built ships."

As wise would it be to let in foreign-made goods at a low duty or free of duty to drive our own products off the American market. "I am satisfied," said President McKinley, "the judgment of the country favors the policy of aid to our merchant marine, which will broaden our commerce and markets and upbuild our sea-carrying capacity for the products of agriculture and manufacturing."

"Our great competitors have established and maintained their lines by Government subsidies until they have now practically excluded us from participation. In my opinion no choice is left to us," said President Harrison, "but to pursue, moderately at least, the same lines." Demonstrated it has been that 75 per cent of the shipyards are now idle, and that the only sea-going ships that are being constructed in the others are the men-of-war ordered by the Government. American shipbuilders can not compete with the shipbuilders of, say, Glasgow and Belfast, and pay American wages. American statesmanship ought surely to be equal to the task of putting the shipbuilders of America on at least even footing with those of foreign countries. The American ship should, indeed, have protection as substantial as that of the American factory or the American farm, whose worth it will multiply and whose products it will increase at a rate incalculable.

THE VOICE OF THE MIDDLE WEST.

[From the Des Moines, Iowa, Capital, April 11, 1906.]

The Senate of the United States has approved the very modest ship-subsidy bill, presented by Senator Gallinger, calling for an average outlay of $4,000,000 a year for ten years by which to build up our insignificant merchant marine. The bill is now in the House, and as usual the prejudice against the term "subsidy" is expected to prevent its passage.

Those Republican newspapers which oppose the ratification of this measure by the House, declaring it to be a species of graft, are either willfully misrepresenting its character or are totally ignorant of its provisions. The Capital has heretofore set out the provisions by which it is safeguarded and the splendid and patriotic results which it promises to attain. It is an American measure, designed to promote American commerce and the welfare of all classes of our people, and its real merits can not be obscured by epithet. Dismayed by the rapid disintegration of our merchant marine, brought about by hopeless competition with the highly subsidized lines of foreign rivals, American Presidents have repeatedly urged remedial action for its restoration to the ocean. Harrison, McKinley, Roosevelt, all have pointed out the humiliating condition in which this country finds itself by virtue of the loss of its once numerous mercantile fleet, and have urged speedy action by Congress. In order to once again resume our rightful position among the maritime nations only one course is open. We must give American shipbuilders the protection which the increased cost of manufacture, the higher scale of wages, and the superior standard of living on the part of American seamen make necessary to insure successful competition with foreign lines.

The bill before the House is a sound, just, and moderate measure, calling for an appropriation of very modest proportions. The great object which it is designed to secure should not be defeated by prejudice or a desire to play to the galleries. It should be considered and voted upon on its merits, and if that is done its passage is assured.

BUILD MERCHANT MARINE OR STARVE, SAYS SHAW—MORE MARKETS FOR MANUFACTURED PRODUCTS NECESSARY—SECRETARY OF TREASURY TELLS UTICA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OPENING OF CANAL WILL GIVE AMERICA SUPREMACY OF SEAS IF SHE WILL BUILD UP MARINE.

[From the New York Commercial, April 17, 1906.]

UTICA, N. Y., April 16, 1906.

Leslie M. Shaw, Secretary of the Treasury, was the principal speaker at the annual dinner of the chamber of commerce here to-night. His subject, "Commercial Expansion of the Nation," he discussed at considerable length, saying, among other things:

"The United States has recently embarked upon its broadest policy as regards the commerce of the country. We have paid $50,000,000 for the privilege of digging a ditch, and propose to pay $200,000,000 or $500,000,000, if necessary, to construct the ditch; then other millions to maintain the ditch, and no end of millions, if necessary, to defend the ditch.

"When all this is done we are under contract to grant its use to all the world on the same terms as to our own people. This expenditure is in the aid of commerce. The construction of the canal will change the line of equal distance from the eastern to the western shore of the Pacific and make possible American control of the commerce of the Pacific.

"The United States has fostered every commercial enterprise, protected every industry, except international shipping. Forty years ago we had only one-fourth as many tons of international freight to carry as we have now, but we carried in our own ships three times as many tons as we carry now. Every fostered enterprise has prospered, but our merchant marine is a thing of the past.

"The international trade of the world amounts to $10,000,000,000 a year, one-seventh of which originates with us and one-ninth finds its way to our ports for ultimate consumption.

"Marvelous and inconceivable as these figures appear, our domestic commerce is two and one-half times as large. The fact that we export more than any other people is very gratifying, but it is dependent in very slight degree upon our skill and foresight as international merchants. The world has six months' supply of food in advance. If harvest should cease to follow seed time for six months the world would starve.

"It requires no international merchants to sell our food to a hungry world when there is no other source of supply, but I warn you members of the Utica Chamber of Commerce that we are approaching a crisis. We as a nation must have more markets for manufactured products, or labor will walk our streets looking for work, and failing to find it will beg bread. Germany is a great manufacturing country. She possesses great skill, great energy, and her people are the best international merchants in the world.

"We turn out finished products equal to those of any other three countries, but this will not continue always, unless we improve our merchant marine and send out our ships as a nation befitting our strength and importance. We occupy the best position on the map; our farms produce more than the farms of any other country; our mines yield gold literally by the carload and silver by the trainload.

"With a suitable merchant marine American enterprise will be given its proportionate share of the carrying trade of the world, and our nation will become the actual, as she is the natural, mistress of the largest of all seas and her financial centers will be the clearing houses for a moiety of the commerce of the world."

TIME FOR ACTION NOW.

Are all the utterances of the President, of great Senators, of party platforms, of industrial organizations, and of newspapers, without regard to party, are these all hypocritical utterances? Do they mean nothing? Were all these things said for the purpose of securing votes? Were all these things said and done for the purpose of temporary party aggrandizement? Were Harrison and McKinley, and is Roosevelt, hypocrites? The party has used these appeals, these utterances, these declarations, to win victories and they have won victories and have sustained no loss. And yet we have people who say: "Oh, I am in favor of building up the American Navy. All that you say about the necessity of it is true; that is all right, but I am afraid I won't be reelected." There is a labor organization that somebody is manipulating; there is a newspaper that sneers at subsidies, although it enjoys every day that it mails its edition a subsidy more direct than any other subsidy in the United States from the bounty of the Government. These petty considerations block the way apparently. We are giving to the scheme of irrigation twice as much money per annum as this bill would cost the Government during its lifetime. We give to the experimental stations of the States in this Congress more money at the present time, and in the future provided for, than would carry this bill through five times over. The improvement of the harbor of Galveston by the United States Government, the improvement of Sabine Pass and Harbor, have caused the appropriation by the United States of half enough money to carry this bill to a triumphant conclusion. And that is not the worst phase of this position. Everybody says that we ought to have ships, that we ought to have commerce, that we ought to control our own carrying trade, that we ought to have our own commercial travelers in the form of ships; they are keen for it, anxious for it, devoted to the idea. They admit the absence of our flag from the seas, they admit the ruin of our industry in the building of ships, they admit everything, but they make no proposition looking to a remedy. In all this long struggle in Congress there has been no bill introduced that for one moment could be considered as a possible suggestion of an alternative remedy. It is the old cry of opposition.

On the 22d of February last, Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT] made a speech in which he compiled and presented with a great deal of force and in great detail the objections that are made to the bill now pending before Congress. I said at the time without intending the slightest reflection upon the gentleman, for whom I have the highest respect, that I had never known so much misinformation to be compiled and transmitted in good English in an hour's time in all my life, and I intimated that at some future time I would try to make that apparent. I am here to-day, Mr. Chairman, to make good, or to attempt to make good, my statement, and I want the gentleman who has done me the honor to come and sit down here where he can hear all that I say, to understand now that I do not complain of him and I make no personal assault upon him. He has been misguided and misled exactly as the American people are being misguided and misled at this time.

NAVY AND MERCHANT MARINE.

But before I proceed to that branch of my argument, I want to refer to the fact that I would not dare to stand here, Mr. Chairman, and tell the people of the country, and the people of other countries who might read what I may say, all that I believe to be true in regard to the American Navy. It is enough for me to say that the building of an enormous navy, which I am in favor of; the continuation of great battle ships, which I shall vote for if I have the opportunity, in the absence of the legislation we seek here by this bill, is simply preparing greater and greater disaster to the American flag and the American Navy.

What was the great distinction between the Russian navy with its grandeur in battle ships, its magnificent guns, its tremendous number of men, and the Japanese navy that subdued and conquered and destroyed the Russian navy? What was the great distinction? After all in the analysis carried to its utmost what do you find is the real reason of the disaster to Russia and the triumph to Japan? I answer and the record answers, the training and preparation in the merchant marine of Japan of the men who manned the ships of Togo and subdued the Russian navy. It is the distinction between the fitted man and the man without training; the man who understands his business and the man who does not, and without elaborating I have this to say, and I challenge contradiction, there is no great navy and there never was a great naval power on the world's face that was worthy of consideration that did not have a merchant marine behind it.

Go to the remotest history, the remotest period of time, when the Roman galley was driven in war by the oar projected from its sides, and coming down to the latest development, and the nation that has a great, well-organized, and well-equipped merchant marine has triumphed and the nation without one has always been subdued. You may talk, Mr. Chairman, and other men may talk, about the improvising of a Navy in time of war. We know something about that, and it would be unpatriotic for me to say all that I might say. No nation in the world is building better ships than we are. No nation in the world is preparing the docks and the navy-yards and all the physical force requisite to a great Navy more industriously and more lavishly than we are, and no nation has the raw material of men better for the purposes of a great navy than we have, but no nation of any importance on the face of the earth is weaker in the personnel of the men who are to man new ships in time of war.

We have some magnificent men, and we can fit some of these vessels out, and we have as capable officers as any country in the world; how many, we will not say. But another thing—and I leave this to be elaborated more fully by those who see fit to consider the topic as important—during our recent war with a most inferior nation, a nation which we knew was inferior when we went to war, a nation that turned out to be vastly more inferior when we got at her strength, how much money do you suppose we paid out for ships and how much money do you think we got back again when we sold those ships, and how many of them were fitted for the purposes for which they were purchased? Now, we hear on gala occasions eloquent speeches about what we will do in case of a war with some great nation. We do not want a war with any nation. If we believe that we would never have a war with any great nation, we would not build a Navy at all; so when you have consented to build a Navy and to keep it going you have consented to the force of the argument which I will make now in favor of a merchant marine.

WHAT OF OUR COMMERCE?

Suppose we had a war to-day, or suppose we had no war to-day, but that England and France had, or that France and Germany had, or that Germany and England had; or suppose even the minor nations of Europe had war with each other; what would become of the commerce of the United States? Ninety per cent of it is being carried in foreign ships, not alone in English ships, not alone in French ships, but in German and Italian and directly in Japanese as well as in Norwegian, Swedish, and Danish. Suppose any of these nations now were involved in war, what would become of our commerce? If we had ships of our own, we could carry our commerce under our own flag and defy the nations that were at war to interfere with us. How long would it be, Mr. Chairman, until these contending forces would enforce the laws of war and seize the merchant ships that were carrying our commerce and drive that enormous commerce that we are so proud of off of the face of the seas? So no great commercial nation can maintain her supremacy in commerce if she does not carry her commerce under her own flag and protect it by her own power and in her own ships.

That is my proposition, and I shall not elaborate it at this time. Mr. Chairman, I propose to refer to the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT], and to refer to it as best I may. It will appear, I am satisfied, that the gentleman from Kentucky has been misled by two classes of information; first, biased and prejudiced testimony coming from foreign countries and unsupported by the facts within our own knowledge, and, second, by a condition that has grown up here, a political cry, a campaign cry, that has gone up in the past ten years throughout this country, aiming at the provisions of any subsidy bill for reasons which I do not care now to suggest.

Provincial statesmanship! Statesmen and newspaper writers who never see above the horizon of their own local interests have been the bane of intelligent consideration of this mighty question. We must have statesmanship that can comprehend the continent, that can appreciate the whole country, not only its productive power, but its relation to commerce abroad.

OUR SHIPS AND ENGLAND'S COMPARED.

The gentleman from Kentucky said:

Now, my first proposition is that we have more ships in the merchant marine than any other country in the world, not excepting England. The last report of the Commissioner of Navigation shows that on June 30, 1905, the United States had 24,681 vessels and the United Kingdom—the British Empire, including her colonies and all—had only 20,452.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Not excepting England.

Mr. GROSVENOR. England. I am glad to see the gentleman has a recollection of the exact language used, and he will appreciate my care in giving it to him.

Now, what do you think these 24,681 ships were made up of? These 24,681 vessels include the coast craft, large and small, on Atlantic and Pacific; the vessels of the Great Lakes; even the fishing smacks of Porto Rico and Hawaii, and the stern-wheel steamboats of our western rivers. They include also the canal boats and barges in use on our small and large streams all over the country, and, I suppose, even the flatboats that drift on the Ohio and Mississippi. But out of this magnificent fleet of 24,681 vessels only 1,372, large and small, are registered for foreign trade, and only about one-half of these are regularly and seriously engaged in it.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether or not the aggregate of vessels represented there as being owned by the British Empire does not include a vast number of small vessels in and around Australia and in the coastwise trade of England and up and down the rivers of Canada, including the St. Lawrence and the Thames and other rivers of that Empire?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will say to the gentleman that I will be prepared to answer it in due course of my procedure, and inasmuch as my speech at this point is, unfortunately for me, written, I will have to wait until I get to that point of my speech.

THE REAL FACTS.

Answering more fully the question of the gentleman from Kentucky, I submit a semiofficial statement, which, after full investigation, I find to give in fewer words and with more distinctness than anything I could give an answer to the gentleman, and all inquirers may rely upon it that this statement is absolutely true. The writer has carefully read Mr. GILBERT's speech, and, having access to the records, furnishes undeniable proof of the exact condition of the situation:

I have your personal letter of the 15th instant. On June 30, 1905, the latest date of our returns, the number of American vessels engaged in the foreign trade was 1,372; gross tonnage, 954,513, including the few whaling vessels still left. The number of vessels engaged in the domestic trade was 23,309, of 5,502,030 gross tons (see Report of Commissioner of Navigation, pp. 274–275). The British Board of Trade's report for 1904 (fiscal year ended April 1, 1905) shows 4,756 vessels of the United Kingdom, of 9,160,021 net tons, engaged exclusively in the foreign trade. Exclusively engaged in the domestic trade of the United Kingdom, 9,443 vessels, of 886,878 net tons. Engaged partly in the domestic and partly in the foreign trade, 280 vessels, of 250,523 net tons. This particular table for some reason chances to be expressed in net tons, while most maritime returns are expressed in gross tons. To make this comparison exact with our own figures, you should add at least one-third to the British tonnage. The number of vessels respectively, of course, would remain unchanged.

The statements being published are so wide of the mark of recognized maritime facts that it is very difficult to reply to them. Thus, at page 3087, left-hand column, he says there are 24,681 American vessels and only 20,452 British vessels. We include under the law in our figures vessels as small as 5 net tons (500 cubic feet), while the British minimum is 15 tons. Of the American vessels, 9,183 are under 20 net tons, and most of these, of course, would not be considered worth counting in British official returns.

Again, at page 3089, right-hand column, Mr. GILBERT refers to freight rates quoted in my report as showing that the coasting-trade rates are the highest in the world. The rates quoted are found at page 14 of my report for 1905, and deal with foreign trade freight rates between Liverpool and New York. They have not the slightest relationship to coasting-trade rates.

Again, at the top of page 3092, left-hand column, Mr. GILBERT refers to the ships in which J. P. Morgan & Co. bought a large interest some years ago as though they were American vessels. Of course such is not the fact. If Mr. GILBERT had turned to the navigation laws (sec. 4132 R. S.), he would have observed that the first qualification of a vessel of the United States is that it shall be built in the United States. Of course Morgan & Co. and other Americans share in the profits or losses of these ships just as they do in the profits or losses of British, continental, or Chinese railroads, etc., if they chance to be investors in such.

At page 3097, left-hand column, Mr. GILBERT speaks of the Southern Pacific Railway as operating seventeen ships in the foreign trade. These ships, with possibly two or three exceptions which run from New Orleans to Cuba, are all in the coasting trade. Indeed, this line is one of the best-known coastwise lines in the country, and how Mr. GILBERT could have made such a mistake I can not understand. He also speaks of the Central Railroad Company of New Jersey as owning twenty-four ships. Now, these vessels are either ferryboats, by which the Jersey terminus of the road is connected with New York, or else barges for the transportation of freight from the Jersey terminus to New York. What possible bearing this ownership has on subsidies or foreign trade or, indeed, anything else but practically municipal and passenger traffic passes my comprehension.

In the last paragraph of his speech Mr. GILBERT states that many American shipowners are engaged in the nefarious business of importing undesirable immigrants. If you will turn to Secretary Metcalf's last report, page 43, you will find a list of 167 regular line steamers coming into New York from Europe, most of which are engaged in the immigrant business. Of these 167, only six are American (four American Line and two Red Star Line). The American Line steamers, as a rule, as you know, do a cabin-passenger business rather than an immigrant business, and the same is true of some of the faster British and German steamers. Most of these 167 steamers, however, do the bulk of the immigrant business at New York. If there is anything nefarious in the business, if the owners of such steamers are engaged in ransacking prisons, slums, etc., abroad to gather up criminals, paupers, and anarchists, they are foreign shipowners.

COASTWISE SHIPPING PROSPEROUS.

There is no complaint from the shipowners of the coast, lake, and river trade of the United States. They are reasonably prosperous.

I merely say now, however, that not one dollar of subsidy proposed in this bill goes to any one of that class of ships.

They have absolute protection from their government against the cheap wages and subsidies of foreign nations, for no foreign craft can carry a single passenger or a ton of merchandise from one American port to another, and none has been able to do this for a hundred years. The immense growth, the prosperity of our domestic shipping, in sharp contrast with the decay and almost disappearance of our foreign-going shipping, is a magnificent tribute to the protective system.

As against our 1,372 vessels, of 954,513 tons, registered for foreign trade, and half of them actually engaged in it, the United Kingdom—the British Empire—as stated on page 169 of the report of the Commissioner of Navigation, has 37,055 vessels, of 12,156,101 net tons.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. You mean gross tons?

Mr. GROSVENOR. So that I have replied to the gentleman's suggestions. Out of 12,156,101 net tons—it is net tons—only 866,878 tons, less than one-thirteenth of the total tonnage, is engaged in the home trade of the United Kingdom; 251,523 tons is partly in the home and partly in the foreign trade, and 9,160,021 tons is in the foreign trade exclusively.

These British vessels carry not only about 80 per cent of the trade between the colonies and the mother country, but upward of 60 per cent of the imports and exports of the United States, as against from 10 to 12 per cent conveyed in our own vessels. And yet the gentleman from Kentucky proclaims that the "United States of America has the largest and most profitable merchant marine of any country on the globe, with the single exception of the United Kingdom."

Nearly a hundred years ago, in 1810, the United States had 981,000 tons of American shipping registered for foreign trade, or actually more than it has at the present time, and instead of carrying 10 or 12 per cent of its own imports in its own vessels, carried in 1810 91 per cent beneath its own flag.

Let me call the attention of gentlemen, you who are proud of the progress of our country, and who go back a hundred years, sometimes fifty, sometimes twenty-five, and sometimes ten, and present figures of our magnificent growth—and yet in this very matter, while we have grown greater and, as we sometimes term it, have grown to be a "world power" from an insignificant government that begged mercy of England a hundred years ago—we have not increased one ton of our merchant-marine tonnage during that hundred years.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not minimize our coastwise trade and magnify our foreign trade? Now, is it not true that there is twice as much freight carried through Sault Ste. Marie as there is through the Suez Canal?

Mr. GROSVENOR. No doubt about that.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Are not our ships busy carrying coastwise traffic, and better employed than in the foreign trade?

Mr. GROSVENOR. And all that, Mr. Chairman, argues conclusively in favor of the American system of protection to our own ships. We have built up this magnificent coastwise trade not by subsidy, but by that which is far better than subsidy—by forbidding the introduction into that trade of every foreign nation in the world. That is where the profit to our shipping has come from, and that is the meaning and that is the significance of our commerce along the long chain of Great Lakes to which I have referred.

THE MATTER OF OCEAN RATES.

The gentleman from Kentucky said:

Now we are confronted with a proposition, headed by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, that we are to increase the rates of the shipping industry because they are too low; or——

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I beg the gentleman's pardon; he does not read that correctly. Inadvertently, he has omitted what I said. Now, I said that the proposition is to increase the freight rate.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Perhaps I had better read the whole paragraph. It is an exact copy from your speech.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Read the whole paragraph and you will find I inveighed against increasing the freight rate.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Which is the same thing as taxing the American people, those who are paying the present rate.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is what I am coming to in a moment. I suggest to the gentleman that when I endeavor to read a portion of one of his paragraphs, which I assure him has been correctly copied from his speech, that he wait until I get through. Then if he wants to put in a plea of not guilty, I will be glad to give him an opportunity to do so, and I think he will want to make several of them before I get through.

Continuing, the gentleman from Kentucky said:

What is the same thing, we are to tax the American people over $60,000,000 in order that American ships may continue to carry the traffic across the sea at the same rate at which it is being carried now without the subsidy.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Freight rates.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Rates.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Freight rates.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will agree that the gentleman meant freight rates, because there is not much about passenger rates.

What is the same thing, we are to tax the American people over $60,000,000 in order that American ships may continue to carry the traffic across the sea at the same rate at which it is being carried now without the subsidy.

There is no pretext of any effort to reduce the freight rates across the sea; there is no promise that the rate from the farm or the factory to the seaboard shall be decreased; but the proposition is that our freight rates across the sea are so low and that our commerce has been carried to foreign markets at such a low price that we must increase the price, we must tax ourselves $60,000,000 or $70,000,000 in order that the American shipowner and the American shipmaster may continue to prosecute their trade at the present rate.

My first proposition is an oral one, that I have not written. There is not a single suggestion anywhere that I have heard coming either in the form of the bill itself, or the report from the Merchant Marine Commission, or the Senate committee, that freight rates are too low. I have no doubt that it may be possible to get up a furor if somebody would go at it in a scientific manner, and were I disposed I could in ten minutes show them exactly how to do it, and get every shipper in the world to show that he has been robbed by high freight rates across the sea.

There is nothing easier than convincing a man that somebody has injured him. No task is easier of accomplishment than the task of making most men feel aggrieved by conditions that they had believed before were in their interest and favor. Cry out "bad freight rates," and although all the world stands astonished at the cheapness of American freights, the shipper will soon come to believe that he is greatly oppressed and outraged. Cry out "cheaper ocean freights," and in a very short time our coastwise merchants and farmers engaged in coastwise shipments can be taught that they are trampled upon and outraged by the very system of freights we have understood to be liberal and generous.

BETTER RATES, BETTER SERVICE.

The gentleman will not find anywhere a single word or complaint from the reports of the Merchant Marine Commission or the utterances of its members or of any advocate of protection for the merchant marine that ocean freight rates are too low or any suggestion of an increase in price. What he will find is not a "pretext," but an assertion again and again that the final operation of the bill of the Merchant Marine Commission will be to reduce freight rates and to improve facilities for the transportation of the products of our farms and factories to the markets of the world. The report of the Merchant Marine Commission, embodied in a report upon this bill of February 1, 1905, from the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, says:

A QUESTION OF MORE TRADE.

Thoughtful men throughout the entire country have now come to see that the question is not merely one of building ships or manning ships, important though that may be to large seaboard communities.

Nor is the question, further, one solely of the national defense, though that of itself would abundantly justify Congressional action. A third imperative motive for the creation of an adequate merchant marine is the need of new and wider markets. Without these, there is such a thing as smothering at home in our own prosperity.

There is one sure way in which these new and wider markets can be gained. Our own people—merchants, manufacturers, bankers, shipowners, working heartily together—must go and get them. We can not depend upon the foreigners for this—not on the foreign shipowner more than on the foreign manufacturer or merchant. When the market is once opened, the foreign ship may take our goods for a consideration, which in the long run is sure to be higher than the price granted to the foreign manufacturer.

NO MERCHANT WOULD DO THIS.

There is not a department store in Omaha or Waco which would dream of intrusting to a rival department store across the street the delivery of its own goods to its own customers. The heads of the two establishments might be tolerably good friends, but merchant No. 1 would instinctively assume that, human nature being as it is, merchant No. 2 would keep his good horses and sound wagons for his own use, and quietly run in his spavined steeds and worn-out vehicles to convey the goods of his competitor. And pretty soon merchant No. 1 would expect to have complaints of short weight or damaged articles or perhaps that the purchases were missing altogether. And then he would begin to see those who were once his customers transferring their business to his rival—so that that "cheap" foreign service would have proved a dear service after all.

This is precisely what is happening to-day in South America. The United States sends no marine delivery wagons of its own to Brazil or Argentina. Even the American mails must cross the Atlantic twice on the subsidized liners of England. The result is the inevitable one, testified to before the Commission by the manufacturers of Cleveland and Milwaukee, that they find it hard to get into the South American market and harder still to stay there—that they can never depend upon the starting of English and German vessels from New York, and that there is much breakage as well as miscarriage of American goods, confusion, and disappointment. Nor need there be any surprise about this. The English and Germany shipowners naturally keep their best craft for their own country's trade and use their inferior ones for the American. And the result is just what was intended by our foreign competitors, that Brazil goes by our door and buys of England and Germany.

The United States sent $13,000,000 worth of merchandise to Brazil in 1894 and only $10,000,000 in 1903. Yet, having plenty of delivery wagons of its own by sea and rail to Canada and Mexico, our country has increased its exports to Canada from $51,000,000 in 1894 to $116,000,000 in 1903, and to Mexico from $12,000,000 in 1894 to $41,000,000 in 1903. The contrast is eloquent. There is no need to look further for an explanation why European shipowners, leagued with European manufacturers, are so insistent that the United States should not go to the expense and trouble of providing transportation facilities of its own in the trade to South America, Africa, and the Orient.

In the supplementary report of the Merchant Marine Commission, presented to Congress on December 6, 1905, it is further emphasized that American ships are needed to give our farmers, manufacturers, and others equitable rates and an efficient service:

HOW OUR TRADE IS HANDICAPPED.

But when we turn to our trade with Asia, Africa, Central and South America, and Australasia we find that conditions are radically different. Unlike the chief European nations, Asia, Africa, Central and South America, and Australasia are not shipowning lands.

We require from them a great quantity of imports, especially articles of food and raw materials for our manufacturers, and the great bulk of these goods are on the tariff free list.

But these countries, unlike Europe, have no ships of their own to deliver all this needful merchandise in our own Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific ports, and, of course, they do not supply the ships that are required for the proper expansion of our export commerce to their own ports. For this service both ways the United States is now dependent almost altogether on the surplus or inferior shipping of Europe. The European powers grant liberal subsidies to maintain great steam lines from their own ports to Asia, Africa, Central and South America, and Australasia, but they do not, if they can help it, allow any of their subsidies to be utilized for the maintenance of steam lines to those competitive markets out of the ports of the United States.

Therefore, the manufacturers, merchants, and farmers of America are at a very serious disadvantage compared with their European rivals in this competitive trade.

STOPPING AT THE OCEAN'S EDGE.

We have in the United States the greatest railroad mileage and unquestionably the cheapest and most efficient railroad transportation in the world. Our unrivaled railroad systems would go far to enable us to command the markets of the world but for the fact that when our goods destined for Asia or Africa or Central America or other distant markets reach the seaboard they find there not the regular steam lines provided by the liberality of European governments, but either no available tonnage at all or some slow, inefficient, uneconomical foreign craft, discarded because of its inferiority from the European steamship service and sent over here by some foreign company as "quite good enough for the Americans."

* * * * * * *

STUNTING OUR EXPORT COMMERCE.

The decline of our ocean shipping, our one unprotected industry, has ruined shipowners and shipbuilders alongshore from Eastport to Galveston and from San Diego to Puget Sound. It has impoverished and scattered our shipyard mechanics, the most skillful in the world. It has robbed the country of the hardy officers and seamen who should constitute our naval reserve; but it has done more than this—it has choked the normal growth of the export trade of the United States to four of the five other great continents. Therefore, there is not a wheat farm in the Dakotas, a cattle ranch in Texas, or a cotton plantation in Mississippi, Georgia, or the Carolinas where the loss of American shipping has not made itself felt in shrunken sales and opportunities for profit.

Of course it will and must cost something to establish American shipping lines and give our people the facilities they need for export commerce. It has cost the European nations, our competitors, something to develop their lines to all quarters of the world. Great Britain alone has expended for this purpose, since 1840, between $250,000,000 and $300,000,000.

SHIPS TO SERVE ALL CLASSES AND SECTIONS.

National subventions to American shipping will, of course, encourage shipowners and shipbuilders of New England, New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Louisiana, California, and Washington; but these ships, built and run regularly and efficiently for the carrying of American mails and commerce, will just as surely win new markets for the farmers, manufacturers, and merchants of every State in the Union who have anything to sell; and unless American ships are encouraged by national legislation these new markets never will be won, for the day will never come when Great Britain or Germany, or France, or Italy, will subsidize great national lines of ships to convey to Africa, or South America, or Asia, or Australasia American goods to compete with European goods or the products of European colonies. If we are ever to have an efficient transportation service to the world's great neutral markets, we must establish it ourselves and maintain and operate it beneath the American flag and in American interests.

PUSHING OUR GOODS IN FOREIGN LANDS.

Not only is an American ship itself the most efficient carrier of American commerce, but the officers of that ship, the American passengers who tread its decks, and particularly the American merchants who go out to represent the steamship company and to push its business, are inevitably pioneers and drummers of American trade in foreign lands. For years our ministers and consuls and American travelers abroad have complained that there were no American mercantile houses in foreign countries, and that American goods, therefore, had to be handled by foreign firms which preferred to sell their own country's merchandise. But why should there be any American houses in South America, or Asia, or Africa, or elsewhere where there are no American ships? Everywhere in the world's experience it has been found that the first merchants who go out to foreign countries go as agents of shipping. Soon goods from the home country are consigned to them; they develop a commission business; they branch out into general mercantile trade and, growing stronger, demand banking facilities.

There were once American houses in China, India, and South America, but that was when we had American ships on whose trade their foundations rested. When these ships vanished the houses themselves soon disappeared. When American ships return, there will again be American mercantile establishments in all ports of the world to push the sales of American goods abroad with the same shrewd sense and indomitable energy that have built up our enormous domestic commerce.

And I will not stop here to read these further paragraphs of that report, but there is not a word of complaint that freights are too high or too low. It is simply an argument in favor of transferring the freight of this country to its own ships. And in the supplemental report of the Merchant Marine Commission, which I had the honor to present to Congress on December 6, 1905, it is further emphasized that American ships are needed to give our farmers, manufacturers, and others equitable rates and efficient service.

MAJOR AND MINOR PREMISES.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interrupt the gentleman too much, but I want to present this proposition to the gentleman from Ohio: Is not the entire scope and purpose of all this effort and argument in favor of ship subsidies predicated upon the major premise that by reason of the increased cost in the construction of American ships, and the increased wage necessary to be paid to American sailors in the operation of American ships, that they can not compete with the foreigner? And is not the failure or the inability to compete with the foreigner due entirely to the traffic rate, the freight rate, the transportation charge in the over-sea trade?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will take great pleasure in reproducing, in a little better language, the supplemental and amended argument of the gentleman from Kentucky. He shall have the benefit of my speech when it is printed, to let the public know that at last he has modified his position upon this great question. And let me say to the gentleman that the major premise in the proposition before the country is nothing of the kind that he has suggested. The major premise, subdivided into a great number of heads, I can state in very few words. It is, first, to take this $200,000,000 of freight and pay it to our own people, and that is the first proposition—I do not claim that is the greatest proposition; second, that we shall establish lines of communication with the great consuming bodies of peoples in South America, which lines of communication will carry our commerce direct to South America in successful competition with the commerce of the older countries, and that the laboring men of the United States, who shortly will wake up to this proposition, shall have the opportunity to build these ships and to man these ships, and that this competition with foreign countries, in so far as wages are higher in America and the living of the men on board the ship is higher, that the subsidy of the Government shall go to equalize the disparity in those propositions. I may enlarge this statement when I come to revise my speech, to give one or two more reasons why.

They are the premises, major or minor, one greater or one smaller, as the case may be; but the question of raising freights was never dreamed of by the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee.

The time is coming and is not far away when the laboring men of this country in bodies of organized labor or unorganized labor will demand to know of the men who have been leading them and who have stood appealing for the interests of foreign ship lines and foreign commercial houses why they have come to infest this Capitol and fought this measure, a measure which every intelligent laboring man knows is a measure in his interest, and they will hurl from leadership and the soft places they now occupy the men who have bartered their interests in this direction.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In connection with this question of our money going abroad to pay for carrying our goods back and forth, has the gentleman any information that he can furnish to the House about what proportion of the capital stock invested in the trans-Atlantic and trans-Pacific lines is invested by Americans, and what share of the profits on that trade come back to America and American stockholders?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can give it, and will give it in the course of my speech.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Can the gentleman approximately give it now in percentages?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can not do it now; but the gentleman from Mississippi will be surprised when he learns how little there is of it, and how small a matter has been magnified into a great matter.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman will excuse me one moment longer, I confess that I do not know, except that some time ago there was quite a little storm, or quite a little tempest in a teapot—I do not know exactly which—in the British Parliament, about American capitalists being about to own all this trans-Atlantic marine business.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; and thereupon the British Government proceeded to subsidize the Cunard and other lines to the extent that practically broke up the American interest in those lines.

AMERICAN AND FOREIGN SUBSIDIES.

But I will not detain the House longer upon this particular point, and I will come to another proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky. The gentleman from Kentucky said there is no naval power in the world that pays subsidies altogether to its ships as large as we do, excepting France.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. In that immediate connection I proceeded to explain that by "direct subsidy" I did not mean to include the mail subsidy.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will put in all that the gentleman said on that subject. His argument may beat mine, but he shall not say at the end that I didn't "tote fair."

The report of the Commissioner of Navigation for 1901 states that Great Britain was then paying $4,874,243 for mail and $662,369 for general subsidies—a total of $5,874,243 for mail and $662,369 for general subsidies—a total of $5,536,612, not including the new Cunard subsidy of $1,100,000, which so soon goes into force.

Japan in that year was paying a total of $2,942,296 in subsidy; Italy, $2,819,451; Germany, $1,825,651.

Not one of these nations is paying less money now in subsidies; all are paying more, and all are aiding their merchant marine in other adroit and effective ways that do not appear in government statements of subsidy payments.

Now, how much is the United States paying? The report of the Superintendent of Foreign Mails for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, says that the United States in that year paid $2,396,761 for the transportation of the mails dispatched to and from foreign countries by sea.

That is where the gentleman from Kentucky fell into an error that is common. He thought that the money that was paid out for the transportation of foreign mails was being paid to American ships. Directly I will show him that the report of the Superintendent of Foreign Mails for 1905 shows that the United States in that year paid $2,396,000 for the transportation of mails dispatched to and received from foreign countries by sea. Of this amount American vessels receive $1,611,505, or just about as much as the British Government paid in subsidy to one single British line—the Peninsular and Oriental—running to the East Indies. The United States paid to foreign vessels $701,989, the rest of the total being for miscellaneous expenditures. On the North Atlantic we paid to American ships $690,554, and to foreign ships $596,858.

We haven't ships enough to carry our own mail, and we pay as much money, or nearly as much, to foreign ships to carry our mails as we pay to our own ships to carry our mail.

THE TRUTH ABOUT RECIPROCITY.

Now, the gentleman from Kentucky says that "We do not pay foreign ships any more than the foreign ships pay our ships. It is a case of reciprocity." That was the most astonishing statement, except eight or ten other ones, that the gentleman from Kentucky made. [Laughter.]

The United States, as has been said, pays to American ships on the trans-Atlantic route $690,554 a year and to foreign ships $596,858. Now, let us look at the "reciprocity." How much do the foreign governments pay to us?

The American Line on the North Atlantic last year received $10,511 from the British Government and $1,614 for mails originating in interior Europe and delivered to the American ships in Cherbourg.

These American liners are not the fastest on the Atlantic Ocean, but they maintain the most regular and swiftest average service throughout the entire year, no other line of any flag having a weekly service in 20-knot steamers. But the British Government, in the spirit of rigid, even extravagant protectionism which characterizes its policy in all maritime affairs, will not allow a pound of British mail or a penny of British subsidy to go to the fast American steamers if it can prevent it. Only letters especially addressed are delivered by the London post-office to the American liners sailing from Southampton. That is why these American liners received only $10,511 in mail pay from the British Government last year, though the United States gave $212,000 to the British White Star Line, $168,000 to the North German Lloyd Line, $101,000 to the British Cunard Line, $64,000 to the Hamburg-American, and $60,000 to the French company.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio one hour more.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Virginia very much, as I find that I shall need considerably more time.

NOT AMERICAN SHIPS.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Does the gentleman from Ohio deliberately say "a British line," when he speaks of the White Star Line?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. The gentleman calls all of these lines British that carry the British flag?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do; because they are British ships.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. They are mostly American ships.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is not an American ship in the White Star Line. There is stock of that line owned by Americans.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Can the gentleman give the figures?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not know the amount.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. If I am not mistaken, Lloyd's Register calls that an American line.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think not. It carries the British flag and it is manned by British seamen. There is not an American sailing captain or officer on those ships.

It is true that at the formation of the International Mercantile Marine Company, by whatever name it is legally known, the American capitalists engaged in that great enterprise bought the stock of the White Star Line, but by no means did the ships become American ships, and on the contrary, they retain all the characteristics of British ships and can not be sold to deflect their nationality; they are to all intents and purposes British ships, although owned by American capital.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Owned by Pierpont Morgan & Co. and operated under the British flag, and is an American line of steamships.

EXTREME BRITISH PROTECTIONISM.

Mr. GROSVENOR. J. Pierpont Morgan & Co. formed a combination in which the White Star Line went in, and how much there is left of that I do not know, except the losses that have accrued, and they are enormous. The British Government carries its protection to British shipping to such a grotesque extreme that if a 20-knot American steamship is sailing from Southampton on a Saturday and a 16-knot British steamship is sailing from Liverpool by way of Queenstown, the slow British vessel will carry the mail. But let us go on. It has frequently happened under this so-called "reciprocity," of which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT] boasts, that merchandise brought to New York on the fast American ships had to wait on the pier several days because the bills of lading had not arrived by the slower British steamship. Time and time again New York merchants have complained against this and written remonstrances to London, but all this has been without the slightest effect on the British Government. It snaps its fingers at the American merchants and goes on boycotting fast American ships and giving the bulk of the mails and practically all of the subsidies exclusively to British vessels, be they slow or fast, 16 knots or 20.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for information. I have seen it stated, and I want to ask the gentleman whether it is true or not, that Great Britain gives her mail even to India from home and back, and generally gives her mail to whatsoever steamships possessing certain requirements, which are specified, bid lowest to carry that mail, whether they are foreign or British.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not so understand it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That statement has been made positively several times, and I want to ask the gentleman for information.

Mr. GROSVENOR. In the investigation that I have made in this matter there is nothing of that kind suggested.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In other words, that Great Britain gives her mail-carrying business to the steamships that carry it at a certain speed and with certain regularity.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, no; they do not do anything of the kind.

Mr. WILLIAMS. To the lowest bidder.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have just shown now that they will not only not give it to an American ship, but that they paid out $10,000 only to the American ships while we were paying more than $300,000 to their ships; and, drawing from my own experience for information, I will state that they deflect the mails and send them by their slow ships in every instance unless you mark a peremptory mark upon the letter that it shall go by way of Southampton.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do I understand the gentleman from Ohio to deny that Great Britain does give her mail, regardless of the nationality of the ship, to the lowest bidder?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, certainly, I deny it. If I am wrong, I will be very glad to be enlightened by the gentleman from Mississippi, because it would be a most important item of knowledge.

THE NEW CUNARD SUBSIDY.

Now, says the gentleman from Kentucky:

Prior to that report—

That of 1902—

the subvention to the Cunard Line was increased from £28,000 to £150,000, and the Government agreed also to lend that company a sufficient sum, at an agreed rate, to build two very large, fast steamers. This, although a new departure for that country, is not a subsidy, but was considered as a method of having certain work performed for the Government, and this is the contract the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] was aiming to state.

The particulars of this Cunard subsidy were published a year ago in the report of the Merchant Marine Commission, Appendix C, as quoted from the report of the Commissioner of Navigation. The British Government contracted to advance to the Cunard company the sum of $13,000,000 for the express purpose of building two new steamships—the rate of interest being the nominal one of 2¾ per cent, and the loan to be repaid in annual installments of $325,000 for twenty years. At the same time the British Government agreed to pay the Cunard company a subsidy for mail and admiralty purposes of $1,100,000 a year.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. What was that line of steamers required to do in order to earn that money?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Build themselves and fight the commerce of the American people.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. How many ships were they required to build?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Two. In other words, the British Government loaned to the Cunard company the money to build new ships, and then gave a subsidy by which the loan may be repaid. In practical effect Great Britain makes a gift outright of two great new steamships to the Cunard company. How would the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT] and other gentlemen on this side treat such a proposition if it were presented in this House for the benefit of some American steamship company? Yet, because this extraordinary transaction is British and not American, the gentleman from Kentucky says that first the loan of $13,000,000 to build new steamships and then the gift of the subsidy of $1,100,000 a year for twenty years to repay the loan is not a subsidy, but a "method of having certain work performed by the Government!" Magnificent method! I would like to see a few methods of that kind applied to the American shipping interests.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Ohio in that connection insert in his remarks the different obligations that were imposed upon that ship company? What were they required to do—the peculiar method by which these ships had to be constructed, the speed they had to make, and the number of trips they had to make? Was it not a quid pro quo, the contract between the Government and the ship line?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will put all of that in in the form of the contract itself. I have the official contract, and it proves that all the skill of the British Government through its Admiralty was brought to bear to make that subsidy of $13,000,000 most thoroughly effective to annihilate the American commerce and build up the British commerce.

GERMANY'S SUBSIDIZED FLEET.

The gentleman from Kentucky said:

I found there were only thirty-seven ships in all the German Empire that receive any bounty at all.

Neither the gentleman from Kentucky nor anybody else can know how many ships in the German Empire are or are not subsidized. It took the State Department of the United States several years to ascertain how much mail subsidy the German Empire paid to its great steamers crossing the Atlantic Ocean. It is the policy of every foreign government to keep as secret as possible both the amounts and the methods which it has adopted of aiding and encouraging its mercantile marine.

All the ships that have been built from the beginning, in 1885, for the subsidized North German Line to the East Indies and Australia—subsidized now at $1,330,000 a year—have been required by the terms of the German laws and the German contracts to be built in German yards by German workmen, and, as far as possible, with German materials. It is this policy chiefly, added to some other forms of state aid, which has developed the mighty shipbuilding resources of the German Empire. The great steamer Deutschland, one of the largest and fastest in the world, running from Hamburg to New York in the service of the Hamburg-American Company, does not belong to the North German Lloyd subsidized fleet; but it would never have been built if this subsidy had not been given, with its requirement that the subsidized steamships should be of German construction.

There is authority for this in the official statement of the report of Prince Hohenlohe, chancellor, to the Reichstag, that "all experts say that without the influence of the Government mail service (the North German Lloyd subsidies) such a steamer as the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse could not have been built." The Kaiser Wilhelm broke the Atlantic record in 1897, and the other great German ship, the Deutschland, was launched from the Vulcan yard at Stettin about three years afterwards. Until these German subsidies were granted there were no yards in the Empire that could build first-class ocean steamers. Now for several years the North German Lloyd has not gone abroad for a single important ship, and the Hamburg-American has purchased but few in foreign countries.

German shipbuilding as it stands to-day owes its existence to the policy of imperial subsidy supplemented by the indirect bounty of the carriage of ship materials at nominal rates on the state railways and the granting of preferential rates to goods exported by German steamers. These expedients altogether make German merchant shipping one of the most ingeniously and thoroughly protected industries in the world. When Herr Ballin, the head of the Hamburg-American Company, distributes circulars among American passengers on his German steamship protesting that his company never received a subsidy, he is trying to delude the American people and through them the American Congress. The gentleman from Kentucky has apparently fallen an easy victim to Teuton misrepresentations.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Now, is it not true that the reduction of the freight rates on the German railroads is only 50 per cent for the freight that is designed for exportation and that after you make that deduction of 50 per cent the German freight rate is still a great deal higher than ours?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, I say to the gentleman, with all confidence in his integrity of purpose, that having reviewed his speech, I shall take with many grains of allowance his statement upon that point.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. The reduction is only 50 per cent.

GERMAN SUCCESS WITH SUBSIDY.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from Kentucky said:

I went so far as to get copious extracts from the contracts between the German Empire and those two ship lines—and there are many articles in each one of those contracts—and each one of those ships is required to circumnavigate the entire continent of Africa on each trip, to go alternate directions, this way this time and that way the next time. The Government goes so far as to designate the ports at which they shall stop.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Whether there is any business or not?

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Whether there is any business or not. They have got to circumnavigate the entire continent of Africa on every trip.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does not that show the wisdom of the German Government in sending its manufactured articles into all the possible and remote parts of the world, while America carries her trade, 92 per cent of it, on foreign ships?

There are requirements as to ports of call, routes to be taken, etc., in existing mail contracts between American steamship companies and the United States. Our ocean mail laws and regulations are among the most stringent and exacting in the world, and heavy penalties are enforced for any infractions of them. Our Government is the only one which requires to-day a 20-knot mail service from the Atlantic coast to Europe maintained throughout the year as a condition of a mail subsidy. Foreign companies compete with our one trans-Atlantic line, but are allowed to substitute smaller and slower vessels whenever they wish. If the American Line does this it forfeits the subsidy for that voyage.

It is stated in the report on German imperial steamship subsidies, already quoted, that the subsidized German line to Africa increased German trade so rapidly that the company's receipts from freight and passengers advanced from 453,000 marks, or only a little more than twice the subsidy in 1892, to 1,476,000 marks, or seven times the subsidy in 1898.

An even more striking demonstration of the fact that steamship subsidies paid by an energetic commercial nation bring increased commerce and increased profits to manufacturers, merchants, and farmers of the country is given in the experience of the German East India subsidized line. In 1888, two years after the North German Lloyd ships started for the East, the exports by these ships were, in quantity, 27,369,000 tons, and in value, 33,190,000 marks. In 1896 the German exports by these German subsidized steamers to the markets of the Orient had increased to 89,148,000 tons, valued at 74,433,000 marks. That is, a subsidy of 4,400,000 marks a year, creating a new German steamship line, had increased the German export trade by more than 50,000,000 marks a year.

Just as sure as the sun rises and sets that will be the experience of the United States if this bill of the Merchant Marine Commission is enacted. It will build ships on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts and the Gulf of Mexico, giving employment to thousands of American mechanics. Millions of dollars will be expended in materials for the construction of these vessels—in iron ore from Lake Superior, Tennessee, and Alabama; in timber from the forests of the North and South. But this is not all. When these ships are built and are running regularly in our service, as these German subsidized steamships run in the service of their Empire, our exports to the West Indies, South America, South Africa, and the Orient will increase by many millions of dollars annually. These steamship subsidies will create new markets for the farms of the Mississippi Valley and factories of the entire country. They will benefit even the State of Kentucky.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I would like to call attention to what I may say is perhaps "an unwarranted extravagance" in the gentleman's last statement. Does the gentleman really think South America could, in its present state of development, give us a trade, if she gave us all of her trade, "equal to the trade that we have gotten to-day, or we are now getting from Europe to-day?"

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the gentleman believe that it would be equal to the cotton crop alone?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should take out of consideration the cotton crop; I should do that.

NOT SEAGOING VESSELS.

The gentleman from Kentucky said:

We have about $13,000,000 invested in shipyards; we have about 34,000 men engaged in building ships. We built in the last two years some naval vessels for which there were appropriated $86,000,000, and the report of the Commissioner of Navigation shows that last year we built 1,102 merchant vessels, and that the figures thus furnished can not be exceeded by any country in the world except the United Kingdom.

It is true that 1,102 vessels were built in the United States last year, but it is also true—and this the gentleman does not state, although it is set forth in the same line of the report of the Commissioner of Navigation—that these 1,102 vessels represented only 330,316 gross tons, or, in other words, that they averaged less than 300 tons each. This new tonnage, over which the gentleman from Kentucky exults as proof that the United States is a great sea power, consisted chiefly of coast craft, like ferry boats, mud dredges, fishing smacks, coal and lumber schooners, tugboats, barges, canal boats, and car floats. There was not one square-rigged vessel for ocean trade among the number.

What do you think, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, of the potency of that argument? He hunts out the number of vessels, flatboats, scow boats, ferryboats, and charges them up as the growth of the American merchant marine. There has not been one square-rigged vessel for ocean trade among the number.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Nobody else is building that kind of vessels now.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There were only seven ocean steel steamers, of a total tonnage of 39,996 tons, and no less than 20,714 tons of this was represented by the immense steamship Dakota, built at Groton, on the Connecticut Thames, for Mr. James J. Hill, president of the Great Northern Railway.

Mr. Hill has stated before the Merchant Marine Commission and elsewhere that under present conditions he would never undertake to build another steamship in the United States. The yard at Groton, where Mr. Hill's two great steamers, the Minnesota and Dakota, were built, has never laid the keel for another ocean vessel. Unless Congress does something at once to aid and encourage the real American shipping in ocean trade, this yard is likely to be abandoned. It surely will be abandoned for ocean shipbuilding unless this bill of the Merchant Marine Commission is passed. Proof of this statement can be found in the following statement, published in the New London (Conn.) Day of February 23, 1906, from the president of the Eastern Shipbuilding Company:

SHIP-SUBSIDY BILL WOULD AID GROTON—FUTURE FATE OF SHIPYARD DEPENDS ON MEASURE NOW IN CONGRESS.

In connection with a denial that the Consolidated road had any intention of running the big shipyard at Groton, President Charles R. Hanscom, formerly at the head of the Eastern Shipbuilding Company, when interviewed by a reporter to-day, gave expression to a statement that the future activity of the shipyard was dependent upon the fate of the ship-subsidy bill now before the House of Representatives.

President Hanscom said that, while he knew of no present negotiations for purchase of the yard being in progress, he believed that if the ship-subsidy bill passed Congress the yard would be purchased and business of shipbuilding recommenced there.

The ship-subsidy bill has already passed the Senate and is believed to have a good chance of passing the House as well, and in case it does the boom which Groton temporarily received seems likely to become a permanent one. President Hanscom's association with shipbuilding interests puts him in position to have authority for the statement that the yard would be started up if the subsidy bill passes.

At the main offices of the Consolidated road in New Haven to-day an official denial was given to the rumor that the Consolidated road, which owns the land on which the shipbuilding plant in Groton stands, intends to buy the equipment and utilize it as a marine repair plant, or for other purposes.

From June, 1901, until the spring of 1905—for four long years—not one order was given to any American shipyard on the Atlantic, Pacific, or the Gulf of Mexico—anywhere on the coasts of the United States—for an ocean steamship for purposes of foreign commerce. There are now only four steamships building for the foreign trade in all America. These are all four in the Cramp yard at Philadelphia. Two of them are building to replace steamers of the Ward Line purchased by the War Department for the Government line between New York and the Isthmus of Panama; the other two are building also for the service of the Ward Line, which is one of the few steamship companies subsidized by the United States to carry the mails—the line running from New York to Cuba and Mexico.

These four American ships, therefore—the only ships building in America; fine, fast, strong vessels of about 7,000 tons, designed under our ocean-mail law as auxiliary cruisers—are themselves proof of the wisdom of the subsidy policy, products of the subsidy system, applied as it has been in a small, cautious way by the United States.

WHAT PROTECTION HAS DONE.

The gentleman from Kentucky said:

Mr. Chairman, I wish the gentleman would stop now and reflect seriously. Here is a country that has the most magnificent coal fields on the globe. Here is a country to whose forests the shipbuilders of Belfast come for their masts and their timber. Here is a country that has the most skillful mechanics and draftsmen upon the face of the globe. Here is a country that in every other particular excels the Britisher in his country. Why, to-day American locomotives can be be heard whistling along the road that leads from Joppa to Jerusalem and from Jerusalem to Damascus. American flying machines sail over the pyramids. The Sphinx has stopped gazing across the desert and has turned to look at the magnificent American trolley lines that are running from Cairo up to the ancient ruins of Thebes and Memphis. [Applause.] You can go into the Orient and in the homes of luxury, even in the zenanas of Persia and in the seraglios of the Ottoman Empire you will find the hum, the click, and clatter of American sewing machines.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. They are made here, however.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. They are made here. You may go upon any ship and you will find it loaded down with machinery—appliances of every kind—sailing across every sea and underbidding the home products of every land.

I pause. I halt at this point to say that I am unable to testify in contradiction of what there is in the seraglios that the gentleman has discovered. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, for the information of the gentleman from Ohio I want to tell him that once a year on the hegira the old Sultan goes from his palace across the Dardanelles to Stamboul to kiss the cloak of Mohammed, and upon that occasion all the houris from the palace came out in splendid array. And I was told by a gentleman who visited Constantinople on that occasion that the most beautiful damsels in all the world appear in those processions. They are the Circassian slaves, lineal descendants of the ancient Greeks, and in their homes of luxury American sewing machines do hum and click and clatter. [Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I have two propositions to make in reply: First, I shall object to publishing in my speech anything that will have a tendency to attract young American tourists to halt at that particular place [laughter], and, second, so far as I am concerned, at my time of life I do not care anything about a matter of that character. [Great laughter.]

It is true that the United States even with its higher priced labor makes and exports some things more cheaply than any foreign nation. But without exception, these things which we make so cheaply and sell successfully abroad are the products of industries long protected by the tariff system which the gentleman from Kentucky and his friends abhor. The protective tariff has built these industries up to great proportions. It has guaranteed to them the home market, enabled them to keep their workmen constantly employed, to effect economies of large and steady production, to standardize their goods, and thus even with high wages to turn out articles produced in immense quantities at prices comparing favorably with the cost of like articles in foreign countries.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. The gentleman from Ohio has been exceedingly indulgent, and I have imposed upon his good nature, but I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio this additional question: He has shown by the whole trend of his argument that our great rival in the ocean-carrying trade is the British Empire. They build the ships and they carry the commodities across the sea. Now I want to ask the gentleman if it is not true that the Englishman receives a higher wage than any of the other laborers upon the continent of Europe, and, if that be true, why it is and how is it that we can not compete with John Bull in the operation of these ships?

Mr. GROSVENOR. John Bull could not send one of those ships successfully abroad in competition with the German or with the Italian or with the Norwegian, if it were not for the subsidies that he pays. So the gentleman's argument comes right back to the proposition that it is the subsidy of English ships that has made the English merchant marine formidable as our successful competitor.

OUR ONE UNPROTECTED INDUSTRY.

If we had protected the ocean shipping trade, the same thing would to-day be true of American shipbuilding. But of all Americans who come face to face with foreign competition, our ocean shipowners alone are unprotected. There is absolutely no aid or encouragement, except the ocean-mail law of 1891, which the United States gives to American shipowners engaged in the sharpest kind of competition with the cheap wages and subsidies of foreign lands. That is the reason—this lack of protection for fifty years and more—why there are almost no ships building in America for ocean trade, and why such ships cost more than the ships of foreign nations.

If, instead of four steamers, we were now building in this country 400 steamers for foreign trade, this immense volume of production, the experience of the yards, and the full employment of capital and labor would make it possible to produce this great fleet for a price per ton very much below the price which American shipyards have to charge to-day, when only one yard in this country is constructing ships for ocean trade.

The gentleman from Kentucky said:

What is the reason, then, we can not, with the same skilled labor, and more iron, and charcoal, and coal, and greater ingenuity and everything—what is the reason we can build everything else on the globe except a ship?

The reason is that we have protected our railroads. We have built thousands of miles by national aid, by State aid, by municipal aid. We have protected by a tariff the building of their locomotives, their cars, and the making of their iron and steel rails in America. Protect ship owning as you have protected railroads, iron manufacturing, cotton manufacturing, woolen manufacturing, and everything else, and you will get the same results.

As the Merchant Marine Commission said, in its report to Congress in January, 1905:

An adequate American ocean fleet would mean the saving to this country of $100,000,000 a year which now goes to build up the commercial power and naval strength of Europe and Asia. For a time it is true that the development of such a fleet would cost something, but all our economic experience goes to show that this increased expense would be temporary, while the saving would be solid and permanent. American bridge makers and locomotive builders could not compete with Europe in price in the early days of their industry, but now that they have developed standard types and attained a huge scale of constant production, American bridge makers and locomotive builders, still paying good American wages, are able to meet their foreign competitors in cost and beat them in the excellence and adaptability of their product. And what is a steamship but a locomotive and a steel bridge wrought together?

THE VALUE OF STANDARDIZING.

The gentleman from Kentucky said:

The gentleman from Ohio has been informed several times that in the old countries they have a certain standardizing of ships; that they have certain patterns and forms, and they build a whole lot of ships of one and the same pattern. I am told, upon further investigation, that is not true. And even if it were true it does not decrease the price of the ships to any material extent.

In this assertion the gentleman from Kentucky is absolutely contradicted by all the best and ablest practical shipbuilders of America.

At the hearing of May 23, 1904, by the Merchant Marine Commission, at New York, one of the witnesses was Mr. C. B. Orcutt, president of the Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Company, a yard on Southern soil and the largest shipyard in America. Senator GALLINGER, chairman of the Merchant Marine Commission, said to Mr. Orcutt (p. 41 of the hearings before the Merchant Marine Commission, vol. 1):

I wish to ask you what, in your judgment, would be the effect on the cost of American-built steamships of a steady, long-continued demand for steamships of standard types—that is, for combined passenger and cargo ships or exclusively cargo ships? To put it in other words, if your Newport News yard constructed in the course of four or five years three 7,000-ton steamers of substantially the same type, would the price of the labor and material for the later vessels be cheaper than for the earlier ones?

Mr. ORCUTT. Manifestly so; and that throws some light on the difference of cost, as to which my figures have startled you. Here are foreign owners—British owners—going into shipyards and ordering not only three vessels of absolutely the same type, and a very cheaply built ship at that, but twenty-five and thirty vessels. I do not know what the shipyards of this country could do in the way of cost if they had such an opportunity of building vessels of absolutely the same type, absolutely the same model and pattern, one after the other, year in and out. We probably should not have very much difference in cost when that opportunity came and had been with us long enough.

From New York the Merchant Marine Commission proceeded to the great shipbuilding city of Philadelphia, and there on May 26, 1904, similar testimony was given by Mr. De Courcy May, president of the New York Shipbuilding Company, at Camden, N. J. (p. 325, hearings before the Merchant Marine Commission, vol. 1):

The CHAIRMAN. Of course if the business of American shipbuilding was in such shape that you had a line of similar ships to construct, so that you could standardize, you would be able to supply them much more cheaply than at present.

Mr. MAY. That is precisely the point, and if we had our yards full, even though not of like vessels, we could do very much better. You will see in our yards a battleship, a cruiser, light-ships, a coastwise steamer, a dredge. If we built vessels of the type of large passenger steamers, or large freighters, we would very soon get the cost down. If we could only have our yards full of work, we would do as the locomotive builders and others have done—be in shape to compete with anybody. We are obliged to take anything we can get, and our yard is full of every variety of work.

At the same hearing another great American shipbuilder, Mr. Edwin S. Cramp, vice-president of the William Cramp & Sons Ship and Engine Building Company, Philadelphia, Pa., said (pp. 424–425, hearings before the Merchant Marine Commission, vol. 1):

There is another argument which I do not think has been brought out enough in talking over this question as to the cost of ships here as compared with England—which, of course, the steamship company must stand—and that is the fact that in England shipbuilding and shipowning is their great industry, as railroading is in this country. The volume of ship construction there is so great that shipbuilders have been able to devote their attention to specialties. For example, some yards build only large cargo boats, others high-speed steamships, others naval vessels, others torpedo boats and destroyers, others smaller craft, from 5,000 tons down; whereas in America, owing to the want of a large market, the builder who may have from five to six slips will frequently have under construction the same number of ships, every one of which is of a different type. You can see a large tugboat on one slip, a river steamer on the next, a cargo boat on the next, a cruiser on another, and a battle ship or a passenger ship on the next slip.

Now, while this diversity of product may result in a better all-around knowledge of this trade on the part of the individual shipbuilder, yet you can see that it certainly interferes very seriously with his cheapening the production. If the American shipbuilder, as has been the case on the Great Lakes, had the opportunity of selecting his type of ships and could have his five or six vessels all of the cargo type under construction at one time, it would enable him to introduce methods of piecework, of standardizing of details, etc., which would enormously decrease the cost of construction. This, of course, has been the reason why that in iron and steel, and industries of a kindred nature generally in America, the individual manufacturer has been able to pay higher wages, and by reason of his enormous output so to cheapen the production that he can undersell the manufacturer of similar articles abroad who would pay lower wages.

Nothing led to the achievement of this result so much as the aid given by our Government in land grants for twenty years, which led to the building of the great number of transcontinental and Pacific railroads, and the building up of rail mills, locomotive works, and other allied industries.

ADMIRAL BOWLES AND MR. NIXON.

At the hearing in New York one of the witnesses was Admiral Francis T. Bowles, formerly Chief Constructor of the United States Navy, now president of the Fore River Shipbuilding Company, of Quincy, Boston Harbor, Massachusetts. This was a part of his testimony (pp. 96–97, hearings before the Merchant Marine Commission, vol. 1):

Senator LODGE. Do you think the labor cost does not enter into the problem?

Admiral BOWLES. I think it undoubtedly does; but the reason, of course, why some products of this country can be sold in competition with those produced in England is this: Take bridge building, which has been spoken of before you to-day. There have been a number of enormous railroads built in this country. Consequently the art of bridge building has been developed here to a very high degree. We do not go abroad and sell Englishmen English bridges. We give them something better—an American-designed bridge, which is produced with the very minimum of labor. The product has been reduced to a science. It is the same way in the production of steel rails. That process has been studied, so that with the vastly improved machinery and a very small amount of labor we can excel their product. In shipbuilding we shall hope to approach that stage when we have the product to deal with.

Another witness in New York was Mr. Lewis Nixon, formerly of the construction corps of the United States Navy, a naval architect and shipbuilder of great experience here and abroad. Mr. Nixon said (pp. 76–77, hearings before the Merchant Marine Commission, vol. 1):

Where we will add 50,000 or 60,000 tons in the course of a year to our foreign-trade tonnage, England will add eighteen hundred thousand merchant tonnage. If the American shipbuilder is to have an opportunity, he must have it along the same lines that his competitor has, and that can be arrived at only by creating a demand for ships. I am satisfied that if the demand for ships is made you will find that the American shipbuilder will rise to the occasion and do just as he did before, many years ago, when our forests ran down to the water's edge and when we built ships of wood. At that time we produced them very much more cheaply than they could have been produced abroad. That day will come some time. Even now the American shipbuilder does not ask bounties or other aid, but only a demand for his product. Given that, he will produce the ships at a cost which will not make the first cost a serious consideration or handicap to ownership of vessels, and eventually he will produce them as cheap or cheaper than his foreign competitors.

Of course we ought to buy our steel here as cheaply as it can be sold abroad. It is true we have the right to import steel free at present if we wish to, and a great many people say, "You can go abroad and buy the material and get a rebate." They do not know the difficulties, the heart-breaking difficulties—the chances of the boat being belated, the chance of delay in shipment, and the chance of ship plates being bent and angles distorted. Our experience at the times when we have imported materials from abroad has not been such as to encourage us to do it any more. We have been willing to pay more, because we have been able to get our work out more quickly. Still, everyone must admit that there is a stupendous difference in the cost at present. I believe with the demand for ships we can overcome that.

These quotations might be continued indefinitely from all of the shipbuilders who appeared before the Merchant Marine Commission in the long course of its inquiry. Every one of them absolutely contradicts the assertion of the gentleman from Kentucky that ships can now be built in this country as cheaply as abroad, and that standardizing and building many ships on the same pattern would have no effect upon the cost, and that "it does not decrease the price of ships to any material extent." Every shipbuilder in America has testified that he can very greatly reduce the cost of ships if he is given the chance to build many ships, just as our steel makers have been able to reduce the cost of locomotives and steel bridges by constructing immense numbers of them steadily year after year behind the wall of the protective tariff.

WHAT ARE BRITISH SHIPS?

The gentleman from Kentucky said:

Going back to where I started, I said a while ago, and several Members around me smiled as if it was a very silly remark, that the ships that were floating the British flag and the German flag were owned by American capitalists, and were not a part of the merchant marine of Germany or England, but were a part of the merchant marine of this country. Inasmuch as the smile seemed to indicate incredulity, I will read from Wheaton's International Law. I remember I read it to a distinguished lawyer, and he said it was an old book and out of date and that I had better get something newer than that.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. A fresh edition?

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I don't know whether it is a fresh edition or not, but I read the first edition of the Bible [laughter] and it is as true now as it was then. I will read section 340:

"By the law of England no ship shall be deemed to be a British ship unless she belongs wholly to owners of the following description: 1. Natural born British subjects. 2. Persons made denizens or naturalized by letters of denization, or by act of Parliament, or the proper authority in any British possession. 3. Bodies corporate established under and subject to the laws of and having their principal place of business in the United Kingdom or some British possession. If any person uses the British flag and assumes the British national character on board any ship owned in whole or in part by any persons not entitled by law to own British ships, for the purpose of making such ship appear to be a British ship, such ship shall be forefeited to Her Majesty."

Now, when the distinguished lawyer said the old book was out of date, I went and got the last book on international law, Oppenheim's International Law. On page 316, volume 1, it says:

"Some countries, like Great Britain and Germany, allow only such vessels to sail under their flag as are the exclusive property of their citizens or of corporations established on their territory."

Sir R. Giffen, K. C. B., a naval expert, thus presents this question: "These foreign ships which are held by them (American citizens and corporations) under a foreign flag are still under the protection of the United States Government as a matter of property. The United States Government recognizes that American citizens have an interest in these ships and are quite prepared to defend those interests. To some extent these American-owned ships under the British flag and under other foreign flags are really to all intents and purposes American ships and will be so treated by the United States Government in many questions that may arise.

That would apply, of course, to the White Star case; they no doubt remain ships under the British flag, but they are ships with a difference, and in certain cases there is no doubt that the United States Government would claim them, or I should imagine so, as American ships."

Then the gentleman read from Wheaton's Law to show that a ship owned by an American, though under the British flag, was to all intents and purposes an American ship.

According to Wheaton, as quoted, British ships can be owned by one of three classes of owners—(1) natural British-born subjects; (2) naturalized British subjects; (3) corporations established under and subject to British laws and having their principal place of business in the United Kingdom or some British possession.

RECOGNIZED AS BRITISH VESSELS.

The foreign ships which the gentleman refers to as a part of the American merchant marine are the ships of the International Mercantile Marine Company, or the Morgan combination. Now, the British Government has formally recognized these ships as British vessels—an integral part of the British mercantile marine. It has done this in a formal agreement between the British Admiralty, the board of trade, and the International Mercantile Marine Company, made on August 1, 1903, and published immediately afterwards by our Department of Commerce and Labor.

Here are some provisions of that contract:

1. The British companies included in the association shall, so long as the stipulations on their part and on the part of the American company hereinafter contained are duly observed, continue to be treated as heretofore on the same footing of general equality with other British companies in respect of any services, naval, military, or postal, which His Majesty's Government may desire to have rendered by the British mercantile marine: Provided, That nothing in this agreement contained shall extend to vessels of uncommercial speed which His Majesty's Government may specially require to be constructed and which are primarily designed for service in time of war.

And these presents also witness that in consideration of the undertaking hereinbefore contained on the part of the parties hereto of the first part, the American company and the British companies included in the association hereby agree as follows:

2. The British companies included in the association shall be and continue to be British companies, qualified to own British ships, and a majority at least of their directors shall be British subjects.

3. No British ship in the association, nor any ship which may hereafter be built or otherwise acquired for any British company included in the association, shall be transferred to a foreign registry (without the written consent of the president of the board of trade, which shall not be unreasonably withheld) nor be nor remain upon a foreign registry. Nothing shall be otherwise done whereby any such ship would lose its British registry or its right to fly the British flag.

4. British ships in the association and ships that may hereafter be built or otherwise acquired for any British company included in the association shall be officered by British subjects, and as regards their crews, shall carry the same proportional number of British sailors of all classes as His Majesty's Government may prescribe or arrange for in the case of any other British line engaged in the same trades.

5. Subject to the existing agreement between the Admiralty and the Oceanic Steam Navigation Company (Limited), and without prejudice to the provisions therein contained, the American company and any British company included in the association shall sell or let on hire at any time during the continuance of this agreement to the Admiralty, when required to do so by the Admiralty, any British ship in the association and any ship hereafter to be built or otherwise acquired for any British company included in the association which the Admiralty may from time to time select. The terms of purchase or hire, if not otherwise agreed on, shall be similar to those contained in the existing agreement aforesaid.

If the American Congress passed a law admitting all the foreign ships of the International Mercantile Marine Company to American registry the American flag could not be hoisted over one of them without the consent of the British Board of Trade. And nearly all of the ships of the International Mercantile Marine Company are British ships; not one is of German and only a few of Belgian registry. They are bound by the strongest kind of an agreement to the British flag.

Out of the one hundred and thirty and odd steamers owned by the International Mercantile Marine Company only 10 are American.

So on indefinitely, showing that the idea that these ships are in any wise or in any sense different from any other British ships is a mistaken idea.

A GOOD THING FOR GREAT BRITAIN.

If American investors put a hundred million dollars into British iron and steel mills, or woolen mills, or Belgian glass factories, would the gentleman from Kentucky be satisfied? Would he be proud of the investment? Would he say that there was no reason whatever for encouraging American capitalists to invest in American manufacturing?

And yet these American investors who put their money into British and other foreign shipping can not be severely blamed. They have had precious little encouragement to put their money into American shipping. Some of these vessels owned in great part by American capital, flying the British flag, are subsidized, and all of them are beneficiaries of the protection which the British Government has always thrown about the British mercantile marine.

The United States has neglected its ocean shipping. It has refused to protect it. It has left it our one unprotected industry. What wonder that Americans who desire to invest in steamship property are compelled to go abroad. We have forced them to go abroad by just such policies as those which the gentleman from Kentucky is advocating.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I understood the gentleman from Ohio to say just now that all those ships were subsidized by the British Government. Now, in point of fact, the British Government does not pay any subsidies at all.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman must not take up my time about nothing. I have not said that they subsidized them. I have not used any such term. I said they were to all intents and purposes British ships and absolutely excluded from any subsidy under this bill.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Did not the gentleman say they were subsidized?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I certainly did not. I read the terms of their contract and nothing else. I do not say anything else about it.

Foreign governments are glad to have American capital invested in their foreign ships so long as these are built abroad, manned abroad, managed abroad, and form a part of the naval reserve of foreign governments. If they can get American money into their foreign shipping and then tie this up with agreements like that between the International Mercantile Marine Company and the British Government, these foreign governments accomplish a double purpose. They discourage the development of American shipping in America and they encourage their own shipping and navigation. Moreover, they secure the help of America's money toward the maintenance of their own naval reserve—and all these foreign governments know perfectly well that there is almost no naval reserve in America and that in case of a serious war our fighting fleet would be crippled and perhaps destroyed through the lack of these indispensable auxiliaries. But American labor gets no advantage whatever when we drive American capital into foreign shipping. These vessels of the International Mercantile Marine Company that fly foreign flags employ practically no American officers or seamen. These foreign ships, of course, are not only built abroad, but are repaired abroad and supplied abroad. This is a good thing for American investors. They get their share of foreign subsidies. They get their dividends, if there are any dividends. But there is nothing in all this for American workingmen. That is not the kind of an American merchant marine that this country wants. These are not ships which the United States could use in case of a war or any other emergency.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman, a moment ago, in reading a part of his remarks, seems to have misunderstood the character of the question I propounded to him. I do not care as to the technical question about what merchant marine the ships belong to. I asked him if he could give me the proportion of dividends——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I said I could not do that.

Mr. WILLIAMS (continuing). Paid to Americans and the proportion of dividends paid to foreigners and to the stockholders in this country?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think I can give the gentleman the dividends. I do not think anybody has got any since they went into this combination. That is my understanding.

THE STANDARD OIL BUGABOO.

The gentleman from Kentucky said:

I took pains to go through Lloyd's Register, and to my utter amazement I found thousands of ships, it seemed to me—I do not remember the number now—that are owned in America, owned by American corporations and floating a foreign flag. Why, if we pass this bill the Standard Oil Company will get a subsidy on fifteen ships.

Great God! if there shall ever be a question come into American politics or arise in the American Congress or in the colleges of the country or the schools of the villages of the country or in the prayer meetings of the country that the Standard Oil Company can be excluded from, I want to belong to that organization, whatever it shall be. [Laughter and applause.] It is a scarecrow; it is the old bugaboo that scares children. Now, here is actually a Congressman from one of the best States in this Union, the Blue-grass State of Kentucky, the State that produces more handsome women and better whisky, it is said—but I do not know anything about either branch of that question [laughter]; here is a Kentucky Congressman who says that under this bill, that he has prepared an elaborate denunciation of, the Standard Oil Company will get a subsidy.

There are not thousands of foreign ships owned by Americans. There are only a few score; that is all. And it is not true that under the bill of the Merchant Marine Commission "the Standard Oil Company will get a subsidy on fifteen ships."

Now, think of that; think of a Congressman—if it had been a Senator I would never have said a word [laughter]; if it had been a Cabinet officer I would have bowed my head in submission; but with the pride I have in the House of Representatives, that there should have been found a Congressman, and a man that I am fond of, to make such a statement as that, I regret it with tears in my eyes.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Ohio is needlessly wasting his sweetness, because it is abundantly true that the Standard Oil Company is an American corporation, and its ships are owned by an American corporation; and the gentleman confuses two propositions that are entirely distinct when he undertakes to show that they are foreign ships simply because an American corporation sees proper to raise a foreign flag at the masthead of those ships.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman had only taken my advice, delivered early in the session, he would not have run into a worse hobble than he was in in his argument that these ships get an interest in the subsidy because they are owned by Americans. Why, the very terms of the law provide this: That the ship must be already registered or built "hereafter" in the United States.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. That is, the one subsidized.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Every one of the Standard Oil tank steamships engaged regularly in the export trade is a foreign vessel—not one American. The bill of the Merchant Marine Commission confines its subventions absolutely to ships "hereafter built and registered in the United States or now duly registered." The Standard Oil Company owns just three American deep-sea vessels; and they are sail craft, built in Maine. Apparently even these three craft, if used by the Standard Oil Company, will be excluded from the benefits of the Merchant Marine Commission bill, for in section 2 it requires that in order to receive subventions a vessel must be "engaged exclusively as a common carrier for the service of the public."

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. That was a Senate amendment, and is not in the original bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is in the bill pending now in the House.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. But it is not in the bill presented by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It was not, but it was in the bill at the time the gentleman made his speech. I have not time to elaborate on that.

So that there is, therefore, nothing at all in this assertion about the Standard Oil Company.

Some of the wisest and most careful Senators framed this provision expressly to shut out from subventions vessels of the Standard Oil and similar companies.

"FREE SHIPS" NOT WANTED.

On this general question of American ownership of foreign vessels it may be said that the matter was very thoroughly investigated by the Merchant Marine Commission. The Commission asked shipowners everywhere whether they wished the privilege of buying or building ships abroad and registering them in this country for the foreign trade, and with scarcely an exception these shipowners did not desire it, stating that they did not believe that a free-ship policy would have any appreciable effect in increasing the merchant marine of the United States. Not only this, but the Merchant Marine Commission caused a special inquiry to be addressed to the International Mercantile Marine Company and the Standard Oil Company and other American owners of foreign tonnage as to whether they would bring their ships under the flag of the United States if they were given an opportunity. Every one of these owners without exception replied that the ships would not be transferred.

Their answers are published in full in the report of the Mercantile Marine Commission for January, 1905, in Appendix D.

These negative replies were received from W. R. Grace & Co.; the International Mercantile Marine Company, P. A. S. Franklin, vice-president; Donald Steamship Company; T. Hogan & Sons, B. N. Baker, Chesapeake and Ohio Steamship Company, and the Anglo-American Oil Company.

One of the concerns argued in general that a free-ship policy would benefit the United States, but still answered no to the specific question. Several of them were willing to naturalize their foreign ships if these ships were given the advantage of subsidy or discriminating duty. But not one concern would bring its foreign ships under the American flag unless some such aid were given.

WHO WILL RECEIVE THE SUBSIDY?

The gentleman from Kentucky said:

I want to make one other suggestion before my time expires, and that relates to something peculiar, which is that all these subsidy bills come before Congress so worded and so shaped up that the ships that commonly carry the commerce of the seas do not get the subsidies. The subsidy goes chiefly to the shipping trusts—to a few capitalists and millionaires. Now, here is a statement from the last annual report of the Commissioner of Navigation: Here are 84 Atlantic steamers, with 156,000 gross tons, with a crew of 2,368 men, that get under this bill $350,471, whereas 626 sailing vessels, with 312,427 gross tons, with a crew of 3,008 men, only get $95,385.

In the first place, as has been said before, if by the shipping trust is meant the International Mercantile Marine Company, the fact is that only ten out of its one hundred and thirty-odd vessels are American and could receive any subvention whatever under the terms of the bill of the Merchant Marine Commission; and four of these are engaged on a contract mail line under existing law and are therefore excluded.

As to the statement that the steamers supposed to be owned by "capitalists and millionaires" get more than the sailing vessels, the fact is that the bill of the Merchant Marine Commission offers exactly the same rate of subvention to a sail vessel as to a steamer, namely, at the rate of $5 per gross ton per year.

A sailing vessel of 1,000 tons that engages in the foreign trade throughout the year will get exactly the same subvention as a steamer. If there is anything fairer than this to the sail-vessel owner, the plan has not yet been devised. The reason, as stated in the table of the Commissioner of Navigation, that 84 steamers get more than 626 sail vessels is that the steamers are generally of larger size, and that these particular steamers referred to were engaged in the foreign trade for relatively much longer periods than sail vessels—that is, that the steamers did much more work in the carrying of our foreign commerce. But if a sail vessel of a given tonnage is engaged in the foreign trade for as long a period as a steam vessel of the same tonnage, it will earn and receive exactly the same subvention under the proposed bill, one of the benefits of which is that it does not discriminate between owners of sail vessels and owners of steamers. Indeed, this bill is the most generous to sail-vessel owners that has ever been brought before the American Congress. If it discriminates in favor of anybody, it is in favor of the owners of sail-vessel property as against corporations owning steamships.

NOT LEAVING THE SEA.

The gentleman from Kentucky said:

The truth is that our ships have not decayed; or if they have decayed at all, it is because our young men have quit the sea for better occupations and refuse to return by reason of the low pay and the hard life and the want of opportunity for advancement.

On page 29 of his report for 1905 the Commissioner of Navigation prints the nationality of seamen shipped before the United States Shipping Commissioners at twenty seaports in the United States in every year from 1896 to 1905, inclusive. This statement shows that the number of shipments of American citizens has increased from 23,142 in 1896 to 59,609 in 1905, that the percentage of Americans has increased from 29 per cent to 49 per cent, and that a large majority of these American citizen seamen are American born. This does not look as if our merchant marine were declining because Americans would not go to sea.

This increase of the American proportion in the crews of American vessels is all the more striking and significant because it is true that with the decline in number and tonnage of our ships there have been decreasing opportunities for employment and advancement. If the American merchant marine were increasing instead of decreasing, nothing is more certain than that young Americans of determination and ambition would go to sea in increasing numbers just as they did in the halcyon days of our merchant marine of years ago.

The gentleman states further, in referring to a table from the annual report of the Commissioner of Navigation, that "the subsidy will go chiefly to certain fast steamers."

The steamers he refers to are fortunately named in this report. Only three or four of these are of a speed as high as 17 knots, and most of them are from 10 to 14 knots, which is by no means swift as considered by the standard of any nation.

THE BRITISH SUBSIDY FLEET.

Further on the gentleman from Kentucky states that—

There are only 35 ships in all receiving the subsidies in the British Empire and only £712,376 12s. 7d. paid.

To prove this assertion the gentleman from Kentucky submits a tabular statement, the present value of which may be conjectured from the fact that it includes in the enumeration of subsidized British steamers the Inman liners City of New York and City of Paris, which have been for more than a dozen years beneath the American flag.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I got it from a Republican Commissioner of Navigation.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly, and got it from a Republican Commissioner of Navigation in his report twelve years ago. The City of New York and the City of Paris they were called. I crossed the ocean in 1890 in the City of New York, then belonging to the Inman Line. Since that time it has been bought by the American Line and transferred by act of Congress. Both of these ships were armed cruisers in the war with Spain, one under the name of Harvard and one under the name of Yale, and to-day they are fast ships in the American Line. They are now known as the New York and the Philadelphia.

But these 35 steamers, or any other list of 35, do not represent the subsidized British shipping. Instead of only 35 subsidized steamers the British subsidized companies own hundreds.

Take the subsidized companies which the gentleman from Kentucky enumerates—and this is only a partial list—the Peninsula and Oriental line owns 45 steamers of more than 12 knots speed and 2,000 tonnage, to say nothing of slower vessels. The Cunard Steamship Company owns 12 steamers of more than 12 knots and 2,000 tons, the Oceanic Company 28, the Orient 5, the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company 13, the Pacific Steam Navigation Company 27, the Canadian Pacific Company 17—a total here in this partial list not of 35, but of 147.

And not all of the subsidized British steamship companies are included in this enumeration. There is, for example, no mention of the Union Castle Line, of the West Indian Line, of the Canadian-Australian Line, and of numerous other concerns receiving subsidies from British colonial governments. This Union Castle combination alone has 36 steamers of about 12 knots speed and 2,000 tonnage.

The list of these subsidized craft submitted by the gentleman from Kentucky is not only antiquated, but is not half complete and is not worthy of the slightest credence.

My statement as to the number of ships owned by these subsidized British companies is taken from page 166 of the Report of the Commissioner of Navigation for 1905, and is drawn by him from the records of Lloyd's Register.

THE OFFICIAL FACTS.

The gentleman from Kentucky said:

The tonnage of American and foreign vessels which entered and cleared in the foreign trade in 1904, and also in 1905, shows of American 6,679,173 and foreign 23,273,237 tons, showing that we carried 22 per cent of all our exports and imports, and yet you have heard it said repeatedly that we are carrying only 8 or 10 per cent of our commerce.

The statement that American ships have lately conveyed only 8 or 10 per cent of our commerce is the official statement of the Government of the United States. As set forth on page 487 of the latest Statistical Abstract of the United States, it shows that the proportion of American imports and exports conveyed by sea in American vessels has decreased almost constantly from 66.9 per cent in 1859 to 10.3 per cent in 1904. This statement is accompanied by the exact value in dollars and cents of the imports and exports in American and foreign vessels. The fact that the proportion of American tonnage entering our ports is larger than the proportion of American carriage is simply another indication of the feebleness of our unprotected merchant marine in the intense competition of the nations.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; if the gentleman will not make it too long.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You have stated that our commerce was so much, I believe, in 1869?

Mr. GROSVENOR. In 1859.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. In 1859.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not say our commerce, I said the percentage that we were carrying.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why is it that it is so much smaller now?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Because we have not the ships.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why have we not got the ships?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have been trying to make that appear. I can not go over that part of my speech again.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I shall read it with pleasure.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You will find pleasure in reading it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will, for I want to find out.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And I shall commend it to you.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The authenticity of it commends it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I thank you very much. I shall commend it to your prayerful consideration, and if I may add to the prayer, that you have intelligence and patriotism sufficient to appreciate it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am very glad that the gentleman has got to the position of having a prayer.

Mr. GROSVENOR. When a hard case comes before me, I always have a prayer. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is the prayer of the righteous only that avails. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is where I come in. [Laughter.]

GERMANY'S STATE-AIDED SHIPS.

The gentleman from Kentucky said:

There are only 130 ships altogether in these two so-called "subsidized lines," of 553,287 gross tons. The German Empire has 6,153 ships, of 3,704,697 gross tons, so that 130 ships, of 553,287 tons, received the so-called "bounty," and 6,023, with 3,151,410 tons, received no bounty.

All German ships share in a greater or less degree in the general imperial policy of encouragement and protection. Subsidy in Germany is only one form of encouragement. Nor is it possible to say definitely what ships are and are not subsidized. For, habitually, vessels built by and for the subsidy and employed on the Asiatic lines are transferred to the New York and other services. So it is not true, as stated by the gentleman from Kentucky, that—

Not a ship of Germany that enters our ports receives a single dollar of subsidy, except where it comes to our ports in exchange for a North German Lloyd steamer.

The gentleman from Kentucky said:

Now, look at the last annual report of the Postmaster-General and you will find that we paid last year to our ships for transporting foreign mails the sum of $2,693,812, or $993,812 more than Germany paid for all ship bounties and mail contracts put together.

The report of the Superintendent of Foreign Mails, already quoted, shows that the actual amount paid to our ships—that is, to American ships—was only $1,611,505, most of the rest going to foreign vessels.

FOREIGN "TRAMPS" CARRYING OUR MAILS.

Postmaster-General Cortelyou says of the merchant marine question in his annual report, 1905:

The Merchant Marine Commission, appointed by Congress on the recommendation of the President, has made its report, and has prepared a bill embodying its conclusions.

The Post-Office Department is deeply interested in having some favorable legislation enacted for the development of our commercial shipping, for it is largely dependent on steamers sailing under foreign flags for the transportation of its foreign mails. The practice of the Department in the dispatch of mails, both foreign and domestic, is to forward by the conveyance giving reasonable assurance of quickest delivery. Foreign governments are steadily increasing the speed of their fast mail steamers, and requiring them to have fixed and regular sailings. Each country pays for the conveyance of its own mails to the exchange office of the country of designation, making no provision for the return trip. It is quite evident, therefore, that if other countries provide a liberal compensation for the carriage of foreign mails on the outward trip, the steamers conveying such mails can well afford, on the return trip, to accept the low rates of compensation for the carriage of mails authorized by the Universal Postal Union.

Fast mail steamers of other countries leaving ports of the United States will more and more absorb our foreign mail transportation until such time as the United States provides an adequate compensation for the outward voyage of steamers of equal speed and regularity of schedule.

Congress has authorized the Postmaster-General, by the act of 1891, to contract with owners of American steamships for ocean mail service in the interest of the postal service alone by requiring that such steamers shall be of a size, class, and equipment which will promote commerce and become available as auxiliary cruisers of the Navy in case of need. The compensation allowed to such steamers is found to be wholly inadequate to secure the proposals contemplated; hence advertisements from time to time have failed to develop any bids for much-needed service. This is especially true in regard to several of the countries of South America with which we have cordial relations and which, for manifest reasons, should have direct mail communications with us. I refer to Brazil and countries south of it. Complaints of serious delay to mails for these countries have become frequent and emphatic, leading to the suggestion on the part of certain officials of the Government that for the present, and until more satisfactory direct communication can be established, important mails should be dispatched to South America by way of European ports and on European steamers, which would not only involve the United States in the payment of double transit rates to a foreign country for the dispatch of its mails to countries of our own hemisphere, but might seriously embarrass the Government in the exchange of important official and diplomatic correspondence.

The fact that the Government claims exclusive control of the transmission of letter mail throughout its own territory would seem to imply that it should secure and maintain the exclusive jurisdiction, when necessary, of its mails on the high seas. The unprecedented expansion of trade and foreign commerce justifies prompt consideration of an adequate foreign mail service. Expenditures to this end seem fully justified, also from the standpoint of a proper naval establishment, inasmuch as the vessels performing service are so built as to be readily converted into auxiliary cruisers.

STANDARD OIL AGAIN.

The gentleman from Kentucky said:

Lloyd's Register for 1905 shows that the Standard Oil Company owns and operates thirty ships in the foreign trade engaged in shipping the oil on which the company fixes the price for all the world, and all of these ships will get bounties under this bill.

You see, he came back on us with the same old Standard Oil Company. I had heard the first part of his speech and thought that was the end of it, but at that time it was only fifteen ships. Before he got through, in the enthusiasm of the moment he said there were thirty ships that would get it. It is an error, first, because foreign ships can not get a dollar of subvention, and second, because the Standard Oil craft are expressly excluded by the requirement that a vessel, in order to receive the subvention, "shall be engaged exclusively as a common carrier for the service of the public."

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, that statement about the Standard Oil Company is due to the fact that after the bill had been prepared by the gentleman's committee and had been introduced there was an amendment introduced in the Senate, that was not in the bill as it left the gentleman's committee, and without that amendment the Standard Oil Company and the Standard Oil Company's ships would get the subsidy.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There was never a bill introduced since I have been a Member of Congress, either in the Senate or in the House, or at the suggestion of the Merchant Marine Commission, or by any individual member of either one of the committees, or any bill reported out of the Senate committee in either Congress, or out of the House committee, that did not expressly exclude the Standard Oil Company from all participation in the subsidy.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky I beg the gentleman's pardon. He does not mean to say that the Standard Oil Company was expressly excluded?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Excluded in this way: I drew one of the amendments to the very first bill that was introduced myself, in which I provided that all vessels built, shaped, and constructed for certain traffic, such as the transportation of molasses and oil, should be excluded, and that has been done ever since.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. On the contrary, does not the bill provide that all American ships engaged in the foreign trade shall receive it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. But these are not American ships, as I have shown.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. But I have shown the gentleman that they are.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You have, and you are mistaken; and that was the first rock on which you split.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. If the ships should be built in the future for the Standard Oil Company's purposes——

Mr. GROSVENOR. They would be excluded.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. They would still be excluded?

Mr. GROSVENOR. They would be excluded under the description given here.

ONLY OCEAN SHIPS NEED SUBSIDY.

The gentleman from Kentucky said:

But what ships are to get this bounty, aside from the mail subventions above mentioned? The report of the Commissioner for 1905, page 214, shows that 1,050 ships will get about all of it, and we have seen that the lion's share will go to 215 fast steamers. We have in all, even by this report, 24,681 vessels in our merchant marine, besides those numerous large fleets owned by our citizens and floating the British flag. But say we have only 24,681 ships; then 1,050 will get the bounty out of the Treasury, and 23,631 will get no bounty at all.

The 23,631 ships which will "get no bounty at all" are the vessels of the coastwise trade—absolutely protected by existing law to the exclusion of all foreign vessels—the freighters of the Great Lakes, the coal and lumber barges of the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, the tugboats of our ports, the stern-wheel boats that ply on the rivers of the South and Southwest, and the canal boats that plow the Erie and other inland waterways. Would the gentleman from Kentucky have these craft, too, receiving subventions from the Government?

Think of a Congressman making such a proposition as that, and a Kentucky Congressman, too, and an intelligent gentleman. Think of that! He takes the whole of our shipping, the vessels of the coastwise trade absolutely protected by existing law to the exclusion of all foreign vessels; the shipping of the Great Lakes——

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Is not every word of that true? Are not all of those 24,000 ships engaged in the coastwise trade except what are engaged in the foreign trade?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly, and they do not need any subsidy.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. For they are already protected by having an absolute monopoly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is what we are saying, but you have complained.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I am making no fight against the monopoly given by the Government to the coastwise trade.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But you are complaining that this great number of ships, which includes the coastwise trade, have no interest in this bill.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I am trying to make the argument that if you give a subsidy to one ship in twenty, it is no advantage to the nineteen which receives no subsidy, and that instead of being an advantage, it would be a disadvantage.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is an afterthought of the gentleman. He certainly never intended that when he used the language which I have here:

We have in all, even by this report, 24,681 vessels in our merchant marine, besides those numerous large fleets owned by our citizens and floating the British flag——

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Isn't that true?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly; and the answer is that 23,000 are engaged in the coastwise trade and wholly protected against all competition.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. The gentleman's argument is that our merchant ships are rotting in the docks and that our ships are being driven from the sea for lack of subsidy.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I haven't said so.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. And I am showing that 23,000 out of the 24,000 are flourishing independent of the subsidies.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from Kentucky is talking about something that has no application to and nothing to do with the question under consideration.

All vessels, steam or sail, large or small, down to 1,000 tons for steamers and 200 tons for sail vessels actually engaged in foreign trade, will receive the subventions of the proposed bill at the one even rate of $5 per gross ton per year. Could anything be more even or more equitable?

FERRY BOATS AND BARGES.

The gentleman from Kentucky said:

The Southern Pacific Railroad Company is shown (by Lloyd's Register) to be operating seventeen ships in the foreign trade. The Central Railroad Company of New Jersey has twenty-four ships. The Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, the Southern Railroad Company, and many other railroad companies and corporations own and operate ships in the foreign trade in connection with their other private business.

The facts are that the steamships of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company run exclusively in the coastwise trade from New York to New Orleans and Galveston.

The twenty-four ships of the Central Railroad Company of New Jersey, which, according to the gentleman from Kentucky, will be earning subsidies on the high seas, are without exception either coal barges or tugboats engaged in hauling coal along shore or ferry boats employed in the tempestuous voyage between New York and Jersey City or down the bay to Atlantic Highlands. [Laughter.] Not one of these twenty-four barges, tugboats, or North River ferry boats has ever made a foreign voyage or ever will.

The Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, as stated before the Merchant Marine Commission at Pensacola, has just one American steamer, of 1,696 tons, beneath the American flag. There is no record that the Southern Railroad Company owns so much as one barge or tugboat or schooner or catboat in the foreign trade.

TIME FOR PLAIN SPEAKING.

Mr. Chairman, I am quite aware that this speech has been tedious and exhaustive of the patience of the House. I have tried to meet some of the objections offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, and have tried to point out to the House exactly the provisions of this bill, and I have but a single proposition to make, Mr. Chairman, in closing. If the American Congress has concluded that nothing shall be done for the American merchant marine by Congress, let us say so now. Two of the great American lines—that from Seattle and that from San Francisco—are offered a very profitable price for their ships. If we are to do nothing they will sell them; so they assure the committee by strong testimony that came from both localities. If there is a hope of doing something they will hold on. Is it fair for the American Congress to be dangling this question before the public; is it the right thing to go on the stump and make speeches in favor of an American merchant marine for the enthusiastic acclaim of the bystanders, and then delay, prevent, and render hopeless the men who are bearing the burden of this condition? I suggest that a joint resolution of Congress be passed, saying in plain terms that the American Congress will subsidize everything else; it will build the Panama Canal at an indefinite cost, running up perhaps to $500,000,000, for the benefit of foreign ships; it will dig out harbors of the United States and drain the rivers to bring the commerce of the country where it can be loaded into the great transportation agencies of foreign nations; but it gives notice now and here that it will cease to fool the American people; that it will cease to appeal to the popular assemblages with promises and break the promise to the hope of the American people. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended until he completes his remarks.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am much obliged to the gentleman from Kentucky; but I have occupied all the time I desire. I thank the House for its consideration, and doubtless will extend my remarks in such a way as to put all of the documents in.

APPENDIX.

SHIP-SUBSIDY LAW—PASSED BY THE FRENCH PARLIAMENT ON APRIL 13, 1906.

[Translation.]

CHAPTER I.—Construction bounty.

SECTION 1. From and after the promulgation of the present law builders of seagoing vessels destined to the merchant marine shall receive bounties fixed as follows per gross registered ton:

I. IRON OR STEEL VESSELS.

(a) Steamers, 145 francs ($27.30).
(b) Sailing ships, 95 francs ($18.34).

The said bounties shall be reduced annually 4.50 francs (86.8 cents) for steamers and 3 francs (57.9 cents) for sailing ships during the first ten years of the law; they shall remain fixed, respectively, at the rate of 100 francs ($19.30) and 65 francs ($12.54) after the expiration of the tenth year.

II. VESSELS BUILT OF WOOD.

(a) Vessels measuring 150 tons or more, 40 francs ($7.72).
(b) Vessels measuring less than 150 tons, 30 francs ($5.79).

Vessels, the outside covering of which is wood, shall be considered as wooden vessels.

Whenever any change is made in a vessel resulting in an increase of tonnage, a bounty shall be granted for such increase upon the basis of the above rates.

Vessels shall be entitled to the bounty as follows:

1. Newly constructed vessels shall receive the rate of the year during which the vessel obtained the French registry or the year during which it has taken its clearance papers, in case it is not destined to the French merchant marine.

2. Vessels which have undergone material change shall receive the rate of the year during which the vessel will first go into commission after the changes have been completed.

SEC. 2. From and after the promulgation of the present law the builders of machinery destined to seagoing vessels of the merchant marine shall receive the following bounties:

1. For motors and auxiliary machinery, such as steam pumps, motor brakes, dynamos, windlasses, mechanical ventilators, which will be installed when new on the vessels, both steamers and sailing ships, and also for new steam boilers and pipes connected therewith, 27.50 francs ($5.31) per 100 kilograms (220.4 pounds).

This bounty shall be reduced annually 75 centimes (14.7 cents) during the first ten years when the law will be in force, and it shall remain fixed at 20 francs ($3.86) after the expiration of the tenth year.

2. For such new parts of machinery which may undergo transformations or repairs, and also for such machines, boilers, and auxiliary apparatus which may be installed, when new, on a vessel, 20 francs ($3.86) per 100 kilograms (220.4 pounds).

SEC. 3. Seven-tenths of the bounties established by the preceding sections shall be paid upon proof of the French registration of the vessel, or when the clearance papers have been given to the vessel, if the latter is not destined to the French merchant marine.

The balance of the bounties shall be paid only to vessels flying the French flag, under the following conditions:

Two-tenths of the bounty at the expiration of one year after the French registration of the vessel.

One-tenth at the expiration of the second year.

Provided, however, That vessels built of wood shall be entitled to the full amount of the bounty upon obtaining the French registry or upon receiving their clearance papers.

Provided further, That in the case of a vessel undergoing changes resulting in the increase of the tonnage, and also in the case of vessels undergoing the repairs enumerated in paragraph 2, the said vessels shall be entitled to the full amount of the bounty upon going into commission or whenever the apparatus or parts of apparatus have been placed on the vessel.

The treasury shall be under no obligation to pay any parts or fractions of the bounties to which no title will be gained at the expiration of the periods of time fixed by this section.

CHAPTER II.

SEC. 4. Seagoing vessels of French and foreign construction sailing under the French flag and engaged in over-sea trade or in the international coasting trade which will obtain the French registry after the promulgation of the present law (provided, however, that the foreign-built vessels be less than 2 years old when registered) shall receive, for each day the vessel is actually in commission, and per gross ton, a bounty fixed as follows:

I. STEAMERS.

Four centimes (0.772 cent) per ton up to 3,000 tons.
Three centimes (0.579 cent) per each additional ton between 3,001 and 6,000 tons.
Two centimes (0.386 cent) per each additional ton above 6,000 tons.

II. SAILING SHIPS.

Three centimes (0.579 cent) per ton up to 500 tons.
Two centimes (0.386 cent) for each additional ton between 501 and 1,000 tons.
One centime (0.193 cent) for each additional ton above 1,000 tons.

The shipping bounty shall be granted only to vessels measuring at least 100 gross tons.

The provisions of paragraphs 2, 3, and 5 of section 5 and paragraphs b, c, d, f, h of section 6 of the law of April 7, 1902, shall apply to the shipping bounty established by the present law.

The shipping bounty shall be paid to every vessel placed under the régime of the present law until said vessel has reached the age of 12 years.

SEC. 5. Shall be entitled to the shipping bounty only the vessels which for each day while they are actually in commission shall have sailed an average distance of at least—

First. Ninety miles for steamers having, on their trial trips, when half loaded, attained a speed of 14 knots or more.

Second. Eighty-five miles for steamers having, on their trial trips, when half loaded, attained a speed of from 12 to 14 knots.

Third. Sixty-five miles for steamers having, on their trial trips, when half loaded, attained a speed of from 11 to 12 knots.

Fourth. Fifty-five miles for steamers having attained on their trial trips, when half loaded, a speed of from 9 to 11 knots.

Fifth. Thirty-five miles for sailing ships.

The days when a vessel will be unavoidably at a standstill shall not be counted for the purpose of computing the aforesaid distances.

Furthermore, in order to be entitled to receive the said shipping bounty, every vessel shall furnish proof that it has carried, dating from the time of departure from and until the day of return to a French port, a quantity of merchandise equal in freight tonnage to at least one-third of the gross register tonnage of the vessel; and it shall furnish proof, further, that said quantity of merchandise equal in freight tonnage to at least one-third of the gross register tonnage of the vessel; and it shall furnish proof, further, that said quantity of merchandise has been carried for a distance at least equal to one-third of the entire distance sailed.

The rate of the shipping bounty shall be reduced 10 per cent for the vessels which shall not have carried for at least one-half of the distance sailed a quantity of merchandise equal in freight tonnage to at least one-half of the gross registered tonnage of the vessel.

SEC. 6. The rate of the shipping bounty shall be reduced 15 per cent for steamers having attained on their trial trips, when half loaded, a speed of less than 10 knots, but equal to or exceeding 9 knots. No bounty shall be granted to vessels having attained on said trial a speed of less than 9 knots.

The rate of bounty shall be increased—

Ten per cent for vessels having attained on said trial trips a speed of at least 14 knots.

Twenty per cent for vessels having attained on said trial trips a speed of at least 15 knots.

Thirty per cent for vessels having attained on said trial trips a speed of at least 16 knots.

CHAPTER III.—Common and transitory provisions.

SEC. 7. The construction bounty and the shipping bounty established by the present law shall not be subject to the deduction provided for in sections 4 and 21 of the law of April 7, 1902.

There shall be included each year in the budget of the marine, to be applied to purposes specified in sections 4 and 21 of the law of April 7, 1902, an appropriation equal to 6 per cent of the estimates of the construction bounties and to 11 per cent of the shipping bounties payable during the year.

Paragraph 3 of section 21 of the law of April 7, 1902, is hereby amended as follows:

"One-third of the fund for the disabled, with the end in view of granting subventions to chambers of commerce, to establishments of public interest, to establishments, institutions, or societies the by-laws of which are framed in accordance with the provisions of the law of July 1, 1901, on associations, or of the law of March 21, 1884, on syndicates, for the purpose of creating or maintaining in France, or in foreign ports most frequented by French sailors, either hotels or marine hospitals, procuring to said sailors lodging, food, medical treatment, or situations, or such other institutions which might be useful to the said sailors, and particularly professional sailors' schools."

SEC. 8. From and after the promulgation of the present law, sailing vessels built under the law of January 30, 1893, and fulfilling the conditions required in order to be entitled to the bounty, and having received their French register before November 1, 1901, shall receive a shipping bounty of 3 centimes (0.579 cent) per gross registered ton, and for each day they are in commission during three years, dating from the time they will cease to receive any benefits from the law of January 30, 1893.

Said vessels shall have to furnish proof of their having carried, on at least two-fifths of their entire voyage, in each direction, a quantity of merchandise equal in freight tonnage to at least two-thirds of their net registered tonnage.

SEC. 9. Vessels now sailing under the French flag, those which shall obtain their French register before the present law goes into effect, and also those which have made an application to be admitted to share the benefits of the law of April 7, 1902, shall remain subject to the laws under which they are now placed: Provided, however, That the owners of vessels having made the aforesaid application may abandon the rights accruing from said application, and elect to be placed under the present law. But in the case of vessels having already obtained their French register, this option shall give a right only to the shipping bounty and not to the construction bounty: Provided further, That said option shall be formulated within two months after the promulgation of the present law.

The shipping bounty which will be granted to the said vessels shall be debited to the appropriation of 50,000,000 francs and 150,000,000 francs voted by the law of April 7, 1902, until payment in full of the sum to which they were entitled under the law at the date of the said option.

No application to be admitted to share in the benefits of the law of April 7, 1902, shall be received after the promulgation of the present law.

SEC. 10. Vessels which will be built in accordance with contracts now in force, in order to be assigned to a subsidized postal service, shall be entitled to receive only the construction bounty of 65 francs ($12.54) per gross ton, and of 15 francs ($2.89) per 100 kilograms (220.04 pounds) of machinery, established by the law of January 30, 1893.

Whenever a navigation company will assign to one of the services defined by the aforesaid contracts a vessel having received the bounties fixed by sections 1 and 2 of the present law, a sum equal to two-thirds of the share of the postal subsidy allowed for the service in question shall be deducted from the amount payable to said company during the entire time of said assignment. The sums so deducted shall be paid over to the Treasury as a reimbursement of the difference between the construction bounties paid for said vessel and the bounties which would have been paid under the law of January 30, 1893. The total amount of the sums deducted shall not exceed the amount of the said difference.

SEC. 11. Until the expiration of the law of April 7, 1902, the construction bounty established by the present law shall not, in the case of new ships which may be entitled to the shipping bounty, be granted for more than 50,000 gross registered tons of steamers and for more than 15,000 gross registered tons of sailing ships per year.

SEC. 12. The right to receive the bounties established by the present law is hereby reserved—

First. In so far as the construction bounty is concerned, to vessels whose hulls, engines, and boilers are built in France;

Second. In so far as the shipping bounty is concerned, to vessels registered in a French port.

Construction and shipping bounties may be granted by the French colonies, out of their local budgets, to vessels constructed in those colonies or having been registered in their ports.

Section 17 of the law of April 7, 1902, is hereby repealed.

Section 2 of the law of September 21, 1793, in so far as it relates to the composition of the crew of vessels registered in colonial ports, is also hereby repealed. The composition of said crews shall be determined by ministerial decree.

SEC. 13. The computation, for the purpose of granting the shipping and construction bounties, of the freight tonnage of the cargoes of vessels which carry passengers, cattle, and vehicles shall be made upon the following basis:

One ton and a half for each passenger taken or put ashore.
Two tons for each head of large cattle, horses, and mules.
One-half ton for each head of small cattle.
Three tons for each two-wheeled vehicle.
Four tons for each four-wheeled vehicle.

The baggage of travelers, including the small provisions taken with them, shall not be counted in the estimate of the merchandise taken or discharged.

SEC. 14. The life of the present law is fixed at twelve years.

SEC. 15. Section 1, paragraph 2, of the law of January 30, 1893, is hereby amended as follows:

Shall be considered as over-sea voyages those made beyond the limits hereafter determined:

To the south 30° north latitude.
To the north 72° north latitude.
To the west 15° longitude west of the meridian of Paris.
To the east 44° longitude east of the meridian of Paris.

Iceland, however, including its territorial waters, shall be considered as coming within the limits of the international coasting trade.

Voyages made within the foregoing limits of the international coasting trade, in order to give right to the shipping bounty, shall be subject to the obligations imposed by section 5 of the present law only in a certain measure, which shall be fixed by a ministerial decree.

SEC. 16. All the provisions of the laws of January 30, 1893, and April 7, 1902, which are not inconsistent herewith shall remain in full force and effect.

SEC. 17. A ministerial decree shall determine the necessary measures for the application of the present law.

SEC. 18. The violation of the laws regulating labor, safety, and hygiene on board vessels, whenever established before the proper authorities, may, according to the gravity of the offense and in case of second offenses, cause the suppression or the reduction by fraction of one or several twentieth parts of the shipping bounty.

Those reductions may be made independently of the prosecution which could be brought against the delinquents for the violation of existing laws and regulations.

SEC. 19. The shipbuilders shall receive the bounty established by the present law only in case the French shops, factories, and yards having contributed to the construction of a vessel comprise, in all, a proportion of foreign workmen not exceeding 10 per cent of the entire number of men employed.

All the regulations concerning safety and hygiene to which French vessels are subjected shall be applied to foreign vessels in French ports.

AMERICAN LABOR AND THE MERCHANT MARINE.

WHERE LABOR STANDS.

No class of American citizens has viewed with greater alarm the gradual decline in American deep-sea shipping under the American flag than organized labor.

In 1896 the Brotherhood of Boiler Makers and Iron-ship Builders of America, with a membership of 60,000, began agitating the question, and later, by a referendum vote, declared in favor of legislation that would aid this dormant and dying industry. One of the results of this agitation was the creation of the Congressional Merchant Marine Commission, which conducted an extensive inquiry into the condition of our over-sea commerce, the cause of its decline, and the best method to be adopted to restore it.

The Commission, after an exhaustive inquiry, made a report recommending bill No. S. 529, entitled "A bill to promote the national defense this country, and if it is enacted into a law it means that American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage," which is now pending in Congress. The bill provides that all vessels affected by it shall be built in the United States, and that all ordinary repairs and overhauling shall be made in this country, and if it is enacted into a law, it means that American products will be carried in American-built ships, manned by American seamen, and steady employment at American wages for 500,000 people.

Statement of Charles Van Druver.

At the hearing before the Congressional Merchant Marine Commission, held in Cleveland, Ohio, on June 28, 1904, among those who addressed the Commission on the subject of restoring the American deep-sea commerce to the place it once occupied was Mr. Charles Van Druver, president of the Cleveland Lodge, representing the Brotherhood of Boiler Makers and Iron-Ship Builders of America.

The proceedings were as follows (see page 837, Vol. II, Report of Merchant Marine Commission):

Mr. VAN DRUVER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I would like to request that the secretary read the paper I have here. It is not very long.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly. I will first ask you what is your present business?

Mr. VAN DRUVER. Boiler making and iron-ship building.

The CHAIRMAN. You represent that organization?

Mr. VAN DRUVER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. We had some of your men before us, I think, in one or two other cities.

Senator PENROSE. We had some of them before us in Chicago.

The CHAIRMAN. The secretary will read the paper prepared by Mr. Van Druver.

The secretary read as follows:

"Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Merchant Marine Commission, we standing before you as representatives of American labor and we ask for the passage of a bill through Congress that will cause the building in American shipyards of the vessels required for our over-sea trade. Congress has for nearly a half century encouraged and maintained foreign shipping in our foreign trade through its refusal to protect American ships in that trade. Hundreds of millions of dollars of American money has been exported to pay aliens to build the millions upon millions of tons of foreign ships that have been and are now employed in doing the bulk of our over-sea carrying. We ask you to reverse the policy and protect American shipowners, American shipbuilders, and those whom they employ, to the same extent that by your inaction and neglect you have so long protected foreign shipowners, foreign shipbuilders, and the aliens whom they employ.

THE VOICE OF LABOR.

"We represent the Brotherhood of Boiler Makers and Iron-Ship Builders, an organization affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. We have a membership of 40,000 American workingmen, with over 500 local lodges in as many different parts of the United States. About one-half of the members of our brotherhood are seeking employment at their trade, the depression in which is due to the fact that the ships employed in doing our foreign carrying are built in foreign countries by foreign labor. And we are but one of a number of labor organizations whose members are largely if not wholly dependent upon American shipbuilding for work at their trades.

"The wages that we receive when we have work are the wages that are paid to skilled mechanics employed in similar industries in the United States, and they are no more than are necessary to enable us to live as becomes American citizens. We will submit to no reduction in the wages we receive in order to have ships built in the United States, and least of all will we accept the wages that are paid in foreign shipyards, which do not exceed one-half of the wages that we are paid.

AMERICAN WAGES MUST NOT BE CUT.

"The remedy for the decline in American shipping must be one that shall leave unimpaired the rates of wages paid in American shipyards; that may as well be understood in the beginning. We know that there are many American workingmen who are steadily employed at their trades and receiving the American scale of wages because the product of their labor is protected by acts of Congress against the free competition of the product of foreign labor. We are convinced that, were it not for the protection which Congress has seen fit to give the product of the American workingmen, fully one-half of those who are now steadily employed would be, like we are, seeking work at their trade. We ask no more than you accord to other American workingmen in the matter of protection, and we assure you that we shall accept no less. The product of American shipyards must be protected against the competition of the product of foreign shipyards, precisely as the product of American labor in other industries is protected against foreign competition.

NO PROTECTION NOW FOR SHIPBUILDERS.

"It will not do to say that foreign ships may not obtain American registers, and assert that this is prohibitive protection in favor of American-built ships, so long as foreign-built ships are permitted to enter our ports and engage in our deep-sea carrying upon terms of absolute free-trade competition with American-built ships. There is no protection for American shipbuilders when the product of their labor is compelled to meet the product of foreign shipbuilders upon terms of free-trade competition. No man will invest in an American-built ship, costing from 25 to 40 per cent more to build than a foreign ship costs, and then attempt to run her in free-trade competition with foreign ships. More than a full generation of trial has shown that such competition is a continuous failure. When it is shown, as it can be, and as it doubtless has been to the entire satisfaction of every member of this Commission, that the cost of operating an American ship is much greater than the cost of operating a competing foreign ship, it must be still more plain to you that there is nothing to attract capital into American-built ships for the foreign trade. But when to these two items of construction and operation expense is added the further handicap of government aid extended by foreign governments to the foreign ships that compete with our own, is it necessary for you to inquire why it is that we have but 1 ton of American shipping in the foreign trade to-day under the American flag where we had 3 tons forty-three years ago?

EVERYBODY ELSE PROTECTED.

"It has been the policy of the United States during practically the entire lifetime of every mechanic actively employed in the United States to-day to protect him against the competition of foreign labor in foreign countries—every mechanic save alone those employed in shipbuilding for the foreign trade. You can not expect American workingmen who are employed in the building of ships to accept a rate of wages only one-half that which they now receive—only one-half that received by their fellow-workingmen in other trades, even if such wages are the total received by the workingmen employed in foreign shipyards.

"Congress, by its protective policy, has created and maintains a condition in the United States which must be uniform to be just. So long as it says to me and to the men of my craft that we can not enjoy the same measure of protection that our brothers who are employed in other industries enjoy so long Congress will continue to investigate the decline of American shipping and seek remedies for its revival. The only remedy is equality of condition for the product of our hands with that produced by the hands of workingmen in the protected industries.

PROTECTION MUST BE UNIFORM.

"For nearly a century Congress has excluded foreign-built vessels from our coastwise trade, and in order for those seeking to engage in that trade to get the vessels they need they must apply to American shipyards. When they get there they must pay the American scale of wages, rates on a par with those paid to other workingmen in other protected trades. In that branch of the industry you long ago created and have ever since maintained a protective condition. Now, gentlemen, do you think that you can induce American workingmen to go into American shipyards and build ships for the foreign trade at one-half the wages that are paid to the men who are building ships for the protected coastwise trade? Certainly not. It must be clear to you that you have created and long maintained a condition of partial protection to which you have been striving for over forty years to adjust a condition of free trade, and of course it does not work. You can not expect it to work. You have got to make the protective policy uniform in our shipyards. The product of our hands must be protected just the same when it is to engage in the foreign trade as it is when it is to engage in the coastwise trade. Either that or else free trade all along the line. But I am sure that none of you expect to find a remedy for our shipping decline through free-trade channels.

"Look around you in this Great Lakes country and see the splendid shipyards and the magnificent shipping, all the product of and giving employment to American workingmen, and remember that it is due to the exclusion of foreign vessels from participation in our trade. It has been reserved for our own people, and it has grown great and prospered as a consequence. Here we build ships for just one trade—a protected trade—and the men employed in the shops and yards receive the full standard of American wages. They will accept nothing else. Do you think that other American workingmen, employed in other American shipyards, even in the building of ships for the foreign trade, will accept less wages than we receive? Of course you do not. Protection is universal in our trade up here, and it sets the standard for the whole country. So, you must see, Congress has created a condition of protection in shipbuilding that governs the whole industry. It is prosperous where it is protected; it is a failure where it is unprotected.

ONLY ONE WAGE SCALE.

"To-day I may be employed at American wages in the building of a vessel for the coastwise trade. Do you think that to-morrow I will accept the foreign rate of wages because my employer puts me on a ship building for the foregn trade that will be compelled to compete under free-trade conditions with foreign ships? Certainly not. Do you think in one shipyard on one set of ways there will be a gang employed in building a ship for the coastwise trade at the American rate of wages and on another set of ways another gang will be employed in building a ship for the foreign trade at the foreign rate of wages? Of course you do not. Do you think that in a boiler shop one set of men will work for foreign wages in building a boiler to be put into a ship for the foreign trade and right next to them another set of men will receive American wages for building a boiler to be put into a ship for the coastwise trade? The condition you have created in our coastwise trade conforms to the general conditions that obtain in all of our land industries, a protective condition, and it is impossible to expect that you can establish a successful branch of the same industry under free-trade conditions. The result of such efforts has been to exclude from our shipyards the building of ships for our foreign trade.

CONGRESS HAS FAILED OF ITS DUTY.

"Rather than extend the protective principle uniformly to our shipbuilding and shipowning interests, Congress has evaded its plain duty, and the men of my craft who are seeking work at their trade are the sufferers for it.

"What is there about our coastwise and domestic trade that justifies Congress extending and maintaining the protective system that it has so long maintained and at the same time justifies the denial of protection to our ships engaged in the foreign trade? How can you look upon our prosperous protected coastwise and domestic shipping and watch its growth and not realize why it is that our shipping in the foreign trade, which is subject to free-trade competition, has shrunk and declined? If you look for a prosperous American shipping upon the seas in free trade and unprotected competition with foreign shipping, under the protective conditions you have created in our coastwise trade and our land industries, you are looking for the impossible.

A PLEA FOR AMERICAN SAILORS.

"Face to face with these facts, as you must have been during the course of your investigations, perhaps some of you are considering why you may not import foreign ships and place them under American registry. You may think that you can by this method at least overcome the higher first cost of building ships in American shipyards. But as you reflect upon that line of policy its impracticability must be manifest. It must be clear that you can not, by increasing the free-trade conditions of competition, establish in a protective country a prosperous industry. It will be no more possible by free ships to establish an American shipping in the foreign trade than it will be to make oil and water mix. Even if you had free ships you would still be confronted with the obstacles of higher cost of operation under the American flag. To overcome this would you advocate allowing aliens to command and officer the ships? Would you diminish the quantity and consent to an impairment of the quality of the food served on board American ships? Would you conform the food scale to that of the most poorly fed of all of the ships with which our own compete? And yet can you contemplate with favor the idea of protecting American officers and seamen on board American ships and at the same time deny protection to our workingmen in the shipyards? Are the men who officer and man our ships any more deserving of protection than those who build them?

LABOR'S INTEREST GREATER THAN CAPITAL'S.

"Look at this problem as you may, gentlemen, it must be clear to you that there is but one course for you to pursue. You must devise a method of protection that shall be practical and effective; which will overcome the adverse conditions under which ships are built in the United States and operated under the American flag in competition with foreign ships. Until you completely abandon the protective policy there is no other way by which you can have an American merchant marine in the foreign trade than by protection. You have free-trade competition between American and foreign ships now in the foreign trade, and that competition has been destructive of American shipping.

Protection, therefore, is the only remedy applicable to existing conditions in the United States in the shipping industry.

"Finally, it must be clear to you all that American labor is more deeply concerned in the successful conclusion of your investigation than any other class of citizens. Capital can find innumerable ways for safe and profitable investment, and you need not concern yourself with its needs. When you are told that those who are seeking protection for our shipping in the foreign trade are seeking to still further enrich those who are already wealthy, that the demand for protection comes from capitalists and corporations, remember that the statement is untrue; that so long as you deny protection to American shipping in the foreign trade, so long you deny employment in American shipyards for American labor. If you fail, if you do not apply a remedy that will be successful, remember that your failure will continue and perpetuate the protection the aliens who now control the building and operation of the shipping in our foreign trade have so long enjoyed. The issue is distinctively and only one between foreign and American labor." [Applause.]

Mr. VAN DEUVER. I thank you very kindly, gentlemen.

Statement of A. D. Porter.

Mr. A. D. Porter appeared before the Commission at Chicago, Ill.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Porter, will you state to the Commission what line of business you are engaged in?

Mr. PORTER. I represent the Boiler Makers and Iron Ship Builders in California, and I am one of the officers of the lodge.

* * * * * * *

Would you mind if the section of the constitution and by-laws to which I refer is read into the record?

The CHAIRMAN. We would be pleased to have it read.

Mr. PORTER. I read from the "Constitution and by-laws of the Brotherhood of Boiler Makers and Iron Ship Builders of America. Revised and adopted by referendum vote, January, 1903."

* * * * * * *

RESOLUTIONS.

The following resolution was unanimously adopted as the sentiment of this brotherhood:

"Whereas the Brotherhood of Boiler Makers and Iron Ship Builders of America believe that Government aid is necessary to induce citizens of the United States to build and operate on the ocean merchant vessels to carry our foreign trade in competition with the vessels of foreign nations, which now monopolize said trade to the almost entire exclusion of vessels of our own country; and

"Whereas the interest of the whole country, the reenforcement of our Navy, the enlargement of foreign markets for our surplus products, the increased employment of our workingmen in the mine, factory, shipyard, and boiler shop, and the training of able seamen would all be promoted by the restoration of our merchant marine to its former position on the seas of the world: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That in our opinion it is the duty of Congress, at the earliest day possible, to enact legislation to secure such restoration by the payment of subsidies to American-built mail carriers and freighters sufficient to enable them to compete successfully with the subsidized and bounty-fed merchant ships of foreign countries in the carrying of our imports and exports."

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Porter, does that represent the views of your entire brotherhood?

Mr. PORTER. Yes, sir.

(P. 712, Vol. II, Report of Merchant Marine Commission.)

Statement of J. J. Fitzgerald.

Mr. J. J. Fitzgerald appeared before the Commission at Chicago, Ill.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Fitzgerald, will you state to the Commission in what line of business you are engaged?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am secretary of the Brotherhood of Boiler Makers and Iron-Ship Builders of America. I have held that position for about ten years now.

The CHAIRMAN. Is your headquarters in Chicago?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes, sir.

I wish to say to the Commission that our organization has for a number of years agitated this ship question, and that we adopted in our convention held in Cleveland, Ohio, in 1896, when this subject came up, a request that all locals would petition the Government to appoint a commission to take evidence and get information that will help the shipbuilders of the country.

MECHANICS MORE INTERESTED THAN SHIPOWNERS.

We also believe that legislation for the upbuilding of American shipping will not be nearly so helpful to capital in the United States as it will be to labor; that there are plenty of avenues always open for the profitable investment of American capital, but only a slight item for the employment of labor. American capital is at liberty at any time to purchase foreign-built ships, while under this proposed law we could employ American capital and at the same time give employment to American mechanics.

Representative GROSVENOR. Your idea is that American capital can go and buy a steamship line if it wants to do it and run it under a foreign flag.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is the idea.

Representative GROSVENOR. But your labor will have to be used in America and under American institutions?

Mr. FITZGERALD. And the ships will have to be manned by American seamen.

I wish to say that in 1896 we started in a small way to agitate this question, and in 1903, by a referendum vote, we adopted as a part of our constitution a resolution indorsing subsidies to American ships.

Representative GROSVENOR. Did the whole association adopt that resolution?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was carried almost unanimously by our 60,000 or less members.

I wish to thank you gentlemen for the privilege of addressing you. I am glad we had a small part in having this Commission appointed.

Representative MINOR. We feel honored by your presence, sir, representing, as you do, so many good and intelligent men.

(P. 720, Vol. II, Report of Merchant Marine Commission.)

THE AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

[Printed by order of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Newport News, Va.]

A healthy merchant marine is important to the due growth of nations.

It is an indispensable factor of sea power.

These principles were recognized in the early history of this country. Profiting by the teachings of Jefferson and Madison, our merchant marine grew to greatness—forsaking these principles it has fallen to decay.

In 1826 98 per cent of our sea commerce was carried in American vessels. In 1905 only about 9 per cent of our sea commerce was so carried.

We pay annually $200,000,000 to foreign freight carriers. In the face of this reckless dissipation of national wealth, continued indifference is criminal.

It is time to return to the faith of our fathers.

This pamphlet contains excerpts from the works, the speeches, and the debates of statesmen whose names are recalled with reverence and gratitude, not only by the Democratic party, but by the American people.

The collection has been printed in the hope that it may serve to arouse new interest in the American merchant marine.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN.

Our early statesmen believed in "fair commerce," which was thus stated by Benjamin Franklin:

"Fair commerce is where equal values are exchanged for equal, the expense of transportation included. Thus if it cost A in England as much labor and charge to raise a bushel of wheat as it costs B in France to produce 4 gallons of wine, then are 4 gallons of wine the fair exchange for a bushel of wheat, A and B meeting at half distance with their commodities to make the exchange. The advantage of this fair commerce is, that each party increases the number of his enjoyments, having, instead of wheat alone, the use of both wheat and wine." (American Navigation (Bates), p. 55.)

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

"Every rational citizen must wish to see an effective instrument of coercion, and should fear to see it on any other element but the water. A naval force can never endanger our liberties, nor occasion bloodshed; a land force would do both." (Letter to James Monroe, Paris, August 11, 1786. Writings of Thomas Jefferson, vol. 4, p. 265. Paul Leicester Ford.)

"Paul Jones is invited into the Empress's service with the rank of rear-admiral, and to have a separate command. I wish it corresponded with the views of Congress to give him that rank from the taking of the Serapis. I look to this officer as our great future dependence on the sea, where alone we should ever think of having a force. He is young enough to see the day when we shall be more populous than the whole British dominions and able to fight them ship to ship. We should procure him then every possible opportunity of acquiring experience." (Letter to Edward Carrington, Paris, May 27, 1788. Writings of Thomas Jefferson, vol. 5, p. 22. Paul Leicester Ford.)

"I am not a Federalist, because I never submitted the whole system of my opinions to the creed of any party of men whatever in religion, in philosophy, in politics, or in anything else where I was capable of thinking for myself. Such an addiction is the last degradation of a free and moral agent. If I could not go to heaven but with a party, I would not go there at all." (Letter to Francis Hopkinson, Paris, March 13, 1789. Writings of Thomas Jefferson, vol. 5, p. 76. Paul Leicester Ford.)

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

"We should not overlook the tendency of a war, and even of preparations for a war, among the nations most concerned in active commerce with this country, to abridge the means, and thereby at least to enhance the price, of transporting its valuable productions to their proper markets. I recommend it to your serious reflection how far, and in what mode, it may be expedient to guard against embarrassments from these contingencies by such encouragements to our own navigation as will render our commerce less dependent on foreign bottoms, which may fail us in the very moments most interesting to both of these great objects. Our fisheries and the transportation of our own produce offer us abundant means for guarding ourselves from this evil." (George Washington's message, December 8, 1790.)

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

"It is not to the moderation and justice of others we are to trust for fair and equal access to market with our productions or for our due share in the transportation of them, but to our own means of independence and the firm will to use them." (Report on the privileges and restrictions on the commerce of the United States in foreign countries, Secretary of State, 1793: Writings of Thomas Jefferson, vol. 6, p. 483.)

"But should any nation, contrary to our wishes, suppose it may better find its advantage by continuing its system of prohibitions, duties, and regulations, it behooves us to protect our citizens, their commerce, and navigation, by counter prohibitions, duties, and regulations also. Free commerce and navigation are not to be given in exchange for restrictions and vexations, nor are they likely to produce a relaxation of them.

"Our navigation involves still higher considerations. As a branch of industry it is valuable, but as a resource of defense, essential.

"Its value as a branch of industry is always enhanced by the dependence of so many other branches on it. In times of general peace it multiplies competitors for employment in transportation, and so keeps that at its proper level; and in times of war—that is to say, when those nations who may be our principal carriers shall be at war with each other, if we have not within ourselves the means of transportation—our produce must be exported in belligerent vessels, at the increased expense of war freight and insurance, and the articles which will not bear that must perish on our hands.

"But it is as a resource of defense that our navigation will admit neither negligence nor forbearance. The position and circumstances of the United States leave them nothing to fear on their landboard and nothing to desire beyond their present rights; but on their seaboard they are open to injury, and they have there, too, a commerce which must be protected. This can only be done by possessing a respectable body of citizen seamen and of artists and establishments in readiness for shipbuilding.

"Were the ocean, which is the common property of all, open to the industry of all, so that every person and vessel should be free to take employment wherever it could be found, the United States would certainly not set the example of appropriating to themselves exclusively any portion of the common stock of occupation. They would rely on the enterprise and activity of their citizens for a due participation of the benefits of the seafaring business, and for keeping the marine class of citizens equal to their object. But if particular nations grasp at undue shares, and more especially if they seize on the means of the United States to convert them into aliment for their own strength, and withdraw them entirely from the support of those to whom they belong, defensive and protecting measures become necessary on the part of the nation whose marine resources are thus invaded, or it will be disarmed of its defense, its productions will lie at the mercy of the nation which has possessed itself exclusively of the means of carrying them, and its politics may be influenced by those who command its commerce. The carriage of our own commodities, if once established in another channel, can not be resumed in the moment we may desire. If we lose the seamen and artists whom it now occupies, we lose the present means of marine defense, and time will be requisite to raise up others, when disgrace or losses shall bring home to our feelings the error of having abandoned them. The materials for maintaining our due share of navigation are ours in abundance. And as to the mode of using them we have only to adopt the principles of those who put us on the defensive or others equivalent and better fitted to our circumstances."

(Report on the Privileges and Restrictions on the Commerce of the United States in Foreign Countries. Secretary of State, 1793. Writings of Thomas Jefferson, vol. 6, pp. 480–481. Paul Leicester Ford.)

"To force shipbuilding is to establish shipyards, is to form magazines, to multiply useful hands, to produce artists and workmen of every kind, who may be found at once for the peaceful speculations of commerce and the terrible wants of war. * * * For a navigating people to purchase its marine afloat would be a strange speculation, as the marine would always be dependent on the merchants furnishing them. Placing as a reserve, with a foreign nation or in a foreign shipyard the carpenters, blacksmiths, calkers, sailmakers, and the vessels of a nation would be a singular commercial combination. We must, therefore, build them for ourselves." (Thomas Jefferson, Secretary of State, 1794.)

JAMES MADISON.

"To allow trade to regulate itself is not, therefore, to be admitted as a maxim universally sound. Our own experience has taught us that, in certain cases, it is the same thing with allowing one nation to regulate it for another. Were the United States, in fact, in commercial intercourse with one nation only and to oppose no restrictions whatever to a system of foreign restrictions, they would, of necessity, be deprived of all share in the carriage, although their vessels might be able to do it cheapest, as well as of the only resource for defense on that side where they must always be most exposed to attack. A small burden only in foreign ports on American vessels, and a perfect equality of foreign vessels with our own in our own ports, would gradually banish the latter altogether.

"The subject was not a novel one; it was coeval with our political birth, and has at all times exercised the thoughts of reflecting citizens. As early as the year succeeding the peace, the effects of the foreign policy, which began to be felt in our trade and navigation, excited universal attention and inquietude. The first effort thought of was an application of Congress to the States for a grant of power for a limited time, to regulate our foreign commerce, with a view to control the influence of unfavorable regulations in some cases, and to conciliate an extension of favorable ones in others. From some circumstances then incident to our situation, and particularly from a radical vice in the then political system of the United States, the experiment did not take effect.

"Out of this experience grew the measures which terminated in the establishment of a Government competent to the regulation of our commercial interests and the vindication of our commercial rights.

"As these were the first objects of the people in the steps taken for the establishment of the present Government, they were universally expected to be the first fruits of its operation." (Speech of Mr. Madison in Congress, 1794. American Navigation (Bates), pp. 43–44.)

MR. NICHOLAS.

"It is a commonly received opinion that trade should be intrusted to the direction of those immediately interested in it, and that the actual course of it is the best which it could take. This principle is by no means a safe one, and, as applied to the trade of America, is extremely fallacious. It can never be just, where the beginning and growth of a commerce has not been free from all possible constraints, as to its direction; as that can never be called a business of election which has been created under foreign influence. The manner in which America was first peopled, and the nurture she received from Great Britain, afford the most striking contrast to the requisite before mentioned. The same effects are by no means to be expected from the greatest commercial wisdom in individuals, which are in the power of the general concert of the community."

"The interest of the whole community, not only those who are carriers, but those also who furnish the object of carriage, positively demands a domestic marine, equal to its whole business; and that, even if it is to exist under rates higher than those of foreign navigation, it is to be preferred." (Mr. Nicholas, of Virginia, in Congress, 1794. American Navigation (Bates), p. 99.)

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

"Yet this is the real object of the drawback system—it enriches a few individuals, but lessens the stock of native productions by withdrawing from them all the hands thus employed; it is essentially interesting to us to have shipping and seamen enough to carry our surplus produce to market, but beyond that I do not think we are bound to give it encouragement by drawbacks or other premiums." (Letter to Benjamin Stoddert, Washington, February 18, 1809. Writings of Thomas Jefferson, vol. 9, p. 245. Paul Leicester Ford.)

"In so complicated a science as political economy no one axiom can be laid down as wise and expedient for all times and circumstances and for their contraries. Inattention to this is what has called for this explanation, which reflection would have rendered unnecessary with the candid, while nothing will do with those who use the former opinion only as a stalking horse to cover their disloyal propensities to keep us in eternal vassalage to a foreign and unfriendly people." (Letter to Benjamin Austin, Monticello, January 9, 1816. Writings of Thomas Jefferson, vol. 10, p. 10–11. Paul Leicester Ford.)

"With respect, however, to so much of my letter of January 9 as relates to manufactures, I have less repugnance, because it is perhaps a degree of duty to avow a change of opinion called for by a change of circumstances, and especially on a point now become peculiarly interesting." (Letter to Benjamin Austin, Monticello, February 9, 1816. Writings of Thomas Jefferson, vol. 10, p. 11. Paul Leicester Ford.)

JAMES BARBOUR.

"Before he commenced the proposed investigation he would make a preliminary remark. He took it for granted that it was the settled policy of the nation to become a naval power. Perhaps there is no one question upon which there is more unanimity. From one extremity of the nation to the other there is but one sentiment, but one wish, everywhere expressed, and that is, that it may go on to increase; and in fond anticipation, judging from the luster of its achievements during the war, they see, in its increase, an increase corresponding with the resources of the nation, the guaranty of our safety and glory. But these fond hopes are illusory, unless wisdom directs our councils. Vain, foolish, your resolutions to build ships, unless you protect your navigation. It is not to the superior fixtures of your vessels, or the ampleness of their supplies you are to look to victory, but to the number and experience of your sailors. If you suffer the power who looks with jealousy on your rising commerce and with envy on the glory of your navy to exclude you from the participation of those advantages which of right as being derived from nature belong to you, abandon all thoughts of an efficient marine and withdraw from the ocean." (James Barbour, of Virginia, 1818. American Navigation (Bates), pp. 214–215.)

THOMAS NEWTON.

"This war (1812) opened an era which raised and gave reputation to the arm destined to protect its rights; and that arm will be able to protect its rights, if the navigation of the United States, the nursery of its strength and efficiency, shall not be sacrificed by a vacillating policy." (Thomas Newton, Representative in Congress from Virginia, and chairman of the Committee on Commerce, 1822.)

JAMES K. POLK.

President Polk, in the annual message to Congress in which he recounted the steps that had been taken in pursuance of the ocean mail legislation of the previous session, said:

"The enlightened policy by which a rapid communication with the various distant parts of the world is established, by means of American-built steamers, would find an ample reward in the increase of our commerce and in making our country and its resources more favorably known abroad; but the national advantage is still greater of having our naval officers made familiar with steam navigation and of having the privilege of taking the ships already equipped for immediate service at a moment's notice, and will be cheaply purchased by the compensation to be paid for the transportation of the mail, over and above the postage received. A just national pride, no less than our commercial interests, would seem to favor the policy of augmenting the number of this description of vessels." (President Polk, message to Congress, 1845. The American Merchant Marine (Marvin), p. 242.)

THOMAS BUTLER KING.

In advocating his ocean mail legislation, Senator Thomas Butler King, of Georgia, said:

"It is sufficient to show that they (British statesmen) are resolved, as far as practicable, to monopolize the intercourse between these two important points. This movement shows clearly that the time has arrived when we must decide whether we must yield this essential branch of navigation and this indirect means of extending our naval armaments to our great commercial rival, or whether we shall promptly extend to our enterprising merchants the necessary means to enable them to bring American energy, enterprise, and skill into successful competition with British sagacity and capital. Of all the lines of sailing packets which cross the Atlantic, not one is owned in Europe, and it is not to be doubted that American merchants, properly encouraged, will assuredly excel in them (steamship lines) as they have done in sailing vessels; and when we reflect that this may be accomplished to the mutual advantage and advancement of our commercial and military marine, it would seem that no statesman ought to hesitate for a moment to give his support to a measure which is demanded alike by prudence and the necessities of our position." (Senator Thomas Butler King, 1845. The American Merchant Marine (Marvin), p. 241.)

OPPOSED PROGRESS.

"American packet owners finding their trade slipping out of their hands, raised an outcry against the employment of steam, and little thinking how futile was such an opposition, prevailed upon the American Government to withdraw its mail subsidy from their own steamers, which left the field clear for British opponents. This is another clear instance of the futility of opposing scientific progress. The immediate effect was the investment of American money in many lines of steamers sailing under the English flag, which redounded to the profit of British masters and crews, as well as that of the steamship managers in Britain, and gave an immense spurt to her nominal tonnage." (Charles Griffin & Co.'s Nautical Series. The British Mercantile Marine, p. 91. 1897.)

INFLUENCE OF SEA POWER.

"When the day comes that shipping again pays, when the three sea frontiers find that they are not only militarily weak, but poorer for lack of national shipping, their united efforts may avail to lay again the foundations of our sea power. Till then, those who follow the limitations which lack of sea power placed upon the career of France may mourn that their own country is being led, by a like redundancy of home wealth, into the same neglect of that great instrument." (The Influence of Sea Power Upon History. Period 1660–1783. (Mahan) p. 39. 1898.)

"For example, formerly and up to the end of the great wars following the French revolution, the population of France was much greater than that of England, but in respect of sea power in general, peaceful commerce as well as military efficiency, France was much inferior to England. In the matter of military efficiency this fact is the more remarkable, because at times, in point of military preparation at the outbreak of war, France had the advantage; but she was not able to keep it. Thus in 1778, when war broke out, France, through her maritime inscription, was able to man at once fifty ships of the line. England, on the contrary, by reason of the dispersal over the globe of that very shipping on which her naval strength so securely rested, had much trouble in manning forty at home; but in 1782 she had 120 in commission or ready for commission, while France had never been able to exceed seventy-one. Again, as late as 1840, when the two nations were on the verge of war in the Levant, a most accomplished French officer of the day, while extolling the high state of efficiency of the French fleet and the eminent qualities of its admiral, and expressing confidence in the results of an encounter with an equal enemy, goes on to say: 'Behind the squadron of twenty-one ships of the line which we could then assemble there was no reserve. Not another ship could have been commissioned within six months.' And this was due not only to lack of ships and of proper equipments, though both were wanting. 'Our maritime inscription,' he continues, 'was so exhausted by what we had done [in manning twenty-one ships] that the permanent levy established in all quarters did not supply reliefs for the men, who were already more than three years on cruise.'

"A contrast such as this shows a difference in what is called 'staying power,' or 'reserve force,' which is even greater than appears on the surface; for a great shipping afloat necessarily employs, besides the crews, a large number of people engaged in the various handicrafts which facilitate the making and repairing of naval material, or following other callings more or less closely connected with the water and with craft of all kinds." (The Influence of Sea Power Upon History. Period 1660–1783. (Mahan.) Pp. 45–46. 1898.)

"Though the treatment of the subject has been somewhat discursive, it may be admitted that a great population following callings related to the sea is, now as formerly, a great element of sea power; that the United States is deficient in that element, and that its foundations can be laid only in a large commerce under her own flag." (The Influence of Sea Power Upon History. Period 1660–1783. (Mahan.) P. 49. 1898.)

ADMIRAL MELVILLE.

"The doom of that nation is sealed which does not possess some foreign markets, and as this trade can only be retained when once secured by a merchant marine and a powerful navy, the question of relative naval strength is one that concerns the commercial, maritime, and military interests of the country." (Rear-Admiral Melville, United States Navy.)

OUR MERCHANT MARINE.

[From the Philadelphia Press, February 5, 1905.]

The letter of Mr. Theodore Justice, printed in another column, is a strong and effective discussion of the question of an American merchant marine. It was drawn out by the objections of a Southern man to the pending bill, and it answers those objections with great cogency. But while it meets sectional criticism from the standpoint of sectional interests, it is broadly national in its view and its argument.

Mr. Justice clearly shows that the highest welfare of the nation demands the upbuilding of a merchant marine. It is needed as the recruiting ground for the Navy. Its construction would greatly enhance the prosperity of the country, like railroad building. It would create a large demand for labor and material. It is vital to the development of commerce, and with the vast increase of our productive capacity more foreign outlets must be found. England, Germany, and France have built up their marine and their commerce by unhesitating aid, and we should do the same thing. We should apply the policy of protection on the sea as on the land.

There is no national question that is more important. We have established our agricultural and our industrial supremacy, and now we ought to achieve commercial supremacy. The development of a merchant marine ought to be made our next great national policy. We are just entering on the expenditure of two or three hundred millions for the construction of the Panama Canal, which under present conditions would be used chiefly by foreign vessels. With such a vast outlay for a commercial waterway connecting the two oceans, it is folly to be deterred from spending eight to ten millions a year to build up the national marine which the canal would serve. Sooner or later we shall apply common sense to this subject.

A GREAT MERCHANT'S ARGUMENT—SHOWS VITAL NEED OF SHIP SUBSIDIES—THEODORE JUSTICE ANSWERS OBJECTIONS TO THE PROPOSED LAW—POINTS OUT HOW PLAN HAS HELPED OTHER NATIONS.

[From the Philadelphia Press, February 5, 1906.]

In view of the vital importance of the ship-subsidy bill to the country at large, the Press prints a letter from Mr. Theodore Justice, written to Mr. Francis B. Reeves, discussing the question of ship subsidy in all its varied bearings. This letter of Mr. Justice was elicited by a letter from Mr. Reeves, which communicated the objections of a southern Senator to ship subsidies.

Mr. Justice, intaking up this phase of the case, in meeting the objections of the southerner, at the outset holds that the chief reason for supporting the subsidy bill is "patriotism," and he then continues as follows:

"We need to build up a mercantile marine to furnish auxiliary ships and seafaring men to supplement our splendid Navy, without which the United States are very much in the position of the Russian navy that collapsed in its first contact with the Japanese fleet, because those splendid Russian ships, equal to any in the world, were manned by inexperienced seamen.

"Russia, like the United States, has no school for its officers and men outside the naval establishment. Japan's preeminent advantage arose largely from the fact that her mercantile marine furnished an unlimited supply of auxiliary vessels and trained seamen, and it is doubtful if any European nation, with the single exception of Great Britain, could have successfully competed with her. The American merchant marine, by national aid, can be built up in a very few years to exceed that of Japan.

WHY THE SOUTH SHOULD SUPPORT IT.

"Our southern people are justly proud of our splendid young Navy, and in so far as they understand it, seem as anxious as citizens from any other part of the country to make it efficient; but they do not seem to comprehend that without a mercantile marine in case of conflict with any first-class navy ours would be in the position of a man with one hand tied behind him, for we have practically no mercantile marine to act as auxiliary to the Navy.

"The American nation should build this up regardless of its cost, and if the southern people could see the importance of it their unquestioned patriotism would impel them to make the matter a national rather than a sectional one.

"As an illustration of the extent of our present weakness, I call attention to the report of Admiral Sampson, who stated that although we were victorious in every conflict in the war with Spain, at the close of the Spanish war we had completely exhausted our auxiliary resources, so that if we had had a single defeat on the ocean, or if the war had continued longer, this weakness would have been brought painfully to the attention of every patriot, whether he be a descendant of the heroes who fought at Yorktown or Cowpens in the South, or of those in the North who aided in the defeat of Burgoyne.

PROFIT THAT GOES ABROAD.

"Our present tariff has enormously developed our internal resources, and we bring our exports to our seacoast and transfer them to transportation lines flying foreign flags, whose annual profit is estimated at over $200,000,000, every dollar of which is spent abroad, whereas if it were earned by Americans, as it can be if this bill is passed, this immense sum would be spent at home, and every section of the United States would be benefited by this addition to our income.

"Besides this, think of the hundreds of millions of dollars that would be spent in building up a navy. As $1,000,000,000 in 1906 is being expended by American railroads in new construction, some idea may be formed of what additional sums would be spent among our people in building a mercantile marine.

"It has been estimated that the labor and material for this would amount to $1,000,000,000, so that when the cost of building an adequate mercantile marine is added to the sums now earned by foreign carriers of our commerce, we would have a total of $1,200,000,000, which, distributed among the American people, would be about $14.50 per capita.

"Can any of our people from either the South or West say that this would be of no benefit to all of the people living in the South or the West?

JEFFERSON FOR SHIP SUBSIDY.

"Thomas Jefferson, a southern patriot, advocated ship subsidy in the early part of the history of this nation, which built up our commerce so that at the time of the breaking out of the civil war, when so many of our ships were swept from the sea by Confederate cruisers, 80 per cent of our commerce was conducted under the American flag.

"About this time the iron ship was substituted for the wooden vessel, and in the beginning Great Britain had an immense advantage over us in building the vessels that carried American commerce, as the tariff had not then built up this infant industry with us, which now is a giant that is ready to build up a new mercantile marine that will beat the world. France and Germany had no protective tariff on ships as they now have, and this permitted the import of free ships, and these nations bought their ships in Great Britain.

"The result was that their commerce continued to dwindle, and it was not until they followed the British example and heavily subsidized their ships sailing to almost all parts of the world that they began to build up a mercantile marine which now carries the greater part of their commerce, and to-day German ships carry half the passengers that a few years ago sailed mainly in British ships. For the result of this commerce you must look at the enormous profits spent among their own people which have accrued to them from their ship-subsidy bills.

"These have given them the building at home of some of the finest steamers in the world, distributed millions of money for material and labor among the German people, as well as trained thousands of seamen, who furnish an auxiliary naval reserve for these fighting ships, an element that we lack.

"One decade of the German policy would make us second only to Great Britain, and two decades of it would make us master of the maritime power of the globe, with the Stars and Stripes floating over magnificent steamers on the high seas. Does this not appeal to the pride of the South?

THE RESULT OF NEGLECT.

"To-day, owing to our neglect to do what the leading nations of Europe have done in subsidizing ships, 90 per cent of our commerce, amounting to $2,500,000,000 annually, is carried under foreign flags, and less than 10 per cent of it under the American flag.

"Foreign ships come to our shores bringing $1,000,000,000 of merchandise, which does not give them a full cargo, so part come here in ballast in order to get a full cargo, amounting to $1,500,000,000 of exports.

"If foreign vessels find it profitable to come here for our immense commerce, and if they are kept alive by subsidies, it follows that we are grossly negligent if we fail to follow this example of Great Britain, Germany, and France. We need to investigate only the example of the latter two. When they had laws permitting them to buy free ships in England, their foreign commerce dwindled away, but when they subsidized their ships it responded with prompt expansion. Thirty years ago German commerce was insignificant—to-day Germany is second only to England in foreign trade and prestige, and the United States in time can exceed them both.

"We are asked if we could expect foreign people to trade with us when we do not do some trading with them. Foreign people buy merchandise of us only when they can buy it cheaper than they can get it elsewhere, and the fact that we are selling 50 per cent more than we annually buy, selling to foreign nations $1,500,000,000 and buying of them only $1,000,000,000, effectively answers this question.

THE SUBSIDY BUGABOO.

"The trouble with some of our southern and western people is this: They think that when they appropriate money for a ship subsidy they are making a present of national cash to some one. This charge was made against the National Government by the South when the Government granted 200,000,000 acres of land, now worth $1,000,000,000, to the transcontinental railways.

"Without those grants their roads could not have been built when they were, and the Indian and the buffalo would still hold sway in some parts of the middle of our continent. But by reason of those grants we have developed the interior of the continent until its value has increased beyond computation.

"I am now selling wool grown on ranches over which I chased the buffalo in 1868. The presentation of these grants, estimated to be worth $1,000,000,000, to the transcontinental railways was one of the best investments 'Uncle Sam' ever made. Yet they were made against the same kind of opposition and from the same side of the country that now opposes the ship-subsidy bill.

WHAT MAY BE ACCOMPLISHED.

"Our shipbuilding industry once placed in a position of comparative independence through the equalization of competitive subventions—a condition to which it is richly entitled for these many years of patient waiting and neglect, past Congresses having permitted every other nation to carry our great commerce—American shipping lines will again be able to compete successfully with formidable foreign rivals that have attained their present power through the same agencies, subsidies, and our mercantile marine during the lives of men who are only now in middle life will be the pride of all the American people.

"From patriotic motives alone, however, every Senator and Member of Congress and their constituents as well should enthusiastically support the building up of a mercantile marine as an auxiliary to our Navy, even if every dollar of the cost came out of the Public Treasury and brought no immediate or direct return, but like the granting of land to the transcontinental railways the money spent on a mercantile marine, independent of the military view of it, will return a thousandfold in wealth to the American people.

NOT A SECTIONAL ISSUE.

"A friend has asked if it is right and just to give Mr. Cramp a million dollars out of public funds and not give the same amount to some struggling industry in the South. Would this friend allow those splendid shipyards in the South, at Newport News and elsewhere, to rust into scrap iron, as they surely will without the assistance which European governments give their shipping?

"In the first place anything that represses our national industries, no matter where they are located, assists in repressing the struggling industries in the South, but aside from this view experience in the Spanish war showed that it was impossible to purchase abroad ships of war. Straining international laws to the breaking limits, we were able to secure only a few old tubs that were of very little assistance to us, and if we had been in conflict with a nation whose navy was very superior to that of Spain our young Navy would have been wiped off the seas; and it is absolutely essential to our national safety that we have more shipyards like those of Cramp's or Newport News.

"There seems to be an idea in some men's minds that all public grants should be withheld if any individuals make any profit out of them. To show the narrow-mindedness of such a view, we simply have to apply to this idea as an illustration the action of the Government in regard to the transcontinental railways spoken of above. The parallel is perfect. The two situations are similar.

"It was argued then that it was wrong to give away these millions of acres that the money might go into the pockets of the few. We all know that a group of men who had the courage to risk their capital in transcontinental railway building were enormously enriched thereby, but that wealth which you might say was taken out of the pockets of one man to put into the pockets of another was but an infinitesimal fraction of the amount by which the national wealth was thereby increased, and it is simply beyond human foresight to estimate its future value; in fact, our country has to either strangle or have these highways of commerce and intercourse.

"France and Germany could not get ships to haul their goods without subsidies, but when the subsidy was granted both their ships and their commerce increased enormously. The expansion of their foreign commerce would be small in comparison with that which would come to the American people, for we have such wonderful resources that with liberal ship subsidies the expansion of our commerce would be so great as to fairly stagger the imagination.

"WORLD MARKET AND HOME MARKET.

"In looking at the history of the decline in American ships it is said that the main cause was the lack of a world's market. The home market is worth more to the American nation than all others put together, but the time is approaching when we will produce so much more than our home market can absorb that we shall be reaching out for foreign markets. To do this we must have ships, and the object of the subsidy bill is to create lines of transportation to markets which are now supplied by other nations.

"In fact, in my business we have commerce with Australia and South America, and, instead of having American vessels to bring our merchandise here, it has sometimes to go to London in British bottoms and then be reshipped to the United States, whereas, if the plan of the ship-subsidy bill was carried out, the profit of this commerce would go to Americans. The merchandise that we are buying in foreign markets would come here in our own ships, which would take back merchandise of American production.

"Outside of all these considerations, however, we come back again to the feelings of patriotism that glow within the breast of every American citizen, and any man from any part of the country who will take the trouble to inform himself and who will divest his mind of sectional prejudice that is blinding him will see clearly that it is our duty to our great progenitors, to ourselves, and to our children to provide for the national defense upon which depends our national life, by supplementing our Navy with an adequate auxiliary mercantile marine.

"A bounty to native-born or naturalized American citizens that would give the Government a claim upon their services in case of war, and sufficient in amount to provide for the comfort and support of aged parents or a widowed mother or sisters, would attract hundreds of thousands of young American boys to a seafaring life.

"Congress, if it is broad-minded and patriotic enough, can provide the ways and means for building up, through a ship-subsidy bill, a satisfactory mercantile marine, which is the only important American industry now neglected.

"In spending millions of dollars for irrigation our National Government is lending its powerful aid to the commendable purpose of making productive great tracts of what is now practically waste land in the West, but the benefit to be derived here pales into insignificance in comparison with that which would accrue to our nation if an equal amount of money were spent to protect and stimulate our mercantile marine, now stifled by the competition of foreign subsidized shipping."

THE AMERICAN IRON AND STEEL ASSOCIATION,
Philadelphia, March 30, 1906.

Hon. CHARLES H. GROSVENOR,
Chairman Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed you will find the promised additional information concerning the prices of ship plates and beams and channels at Pittsburg. You will notice that the tables sent give the prices of ship plates from October, 1900, to March, 1906, and of beams and channels from January 1, 1904, to the end of March, 1906. I hope that the prices sent will fill your wants.

Very truly, yours,

JAMES M. SWANK.

AVERAGE MONTHLY PRICES OF STEEL SHIP PLATES AT PITTSBURG.

SUBSIDIES AND BOUNTIES ALWAYS FORCE LOWER FREIGHT CHARGES.

[Published by the Merchant Marine League of the United States, organized at Cleveland November 21, 1904.]

SUBSIDIZED SHIPPING MEANS LOWER FREIGHT RATES.

That a subsidized American merchant marine would cause an immediate and permanent reduction in ocean freight rates most people would not, at first thought, believe. Upon reflection, however, the logic of such a consequence, in theory, and its actual effect in concrete operation would be demonstrated. The law of supply and demand is immutable. If there are a few carriers, the rates of freight are high; if there are many, the rates are low. With an increased number of ships offering for the cargoes that are to be carried, as would follow the creation of American ships under subsidy legislation, inevitably and immediately there would be a reduction in the rates made by the American ships in order to secure the carrying from the foreign ships now enjoying that carrying. The idea that American ships would demand, and that exporters and shippers would pay, greater freight rates to American ships for carrying cargoes than foreign ships would do the carrying for is, manifestly, absurd. And yet, if there has been one thought more than another hammered into the minds of the American people by the people and the press who are opposed to subsidies to American ships it is that obvious fallacy.

THE PROOF IS ABUNDANT AND CONVINCING.

All over the United States to-day the people find that when a new railroad parallels an existing line a reduction in rates of transportation follows. If the price of a certain staple agricultural product is high it attracts farmers into planting their soils with that staple and the increased competition reduces the cost. A manufacturer is successful in his particular line and a competitor arises and shares the profits, but only by reducing the cost to the consumers. The result is an increased product, a more liberal purchase by consumers, and subsequent profit to two where but one profited before. The same is true afloat. Where but one ship offers for two cargoes the rate of freight is fixed by the shipowner, and it is high; where there are two ships offering for one cargo the rate of freight is fixed by the shipper, and the rate is low. These facts are fundamental.

GERMANY'S EXPERIENCE WITH SUBSIDIES.

In 1886, for example, the German Government began subsidizing the North German Lloyd Steamship Company. The first year the total expense of the operation of the ships exceeded the receipts from all sources for the carriage of passengers and freight by 1,601,039 marks, but the Government subsidy, which amounted to 1,571,712 marks, reduced the net loss for the year to but 29,327 marks. The second year, with the increased number of ships required and put into operation, the steamship company lost 5,778,034 marks more than it received from freight and passenger transportation, the subsidy from the Government still falling short, by 1,388,034 marks, of making good this loss. The third year the net loss to the company was 419,907 marks, although the receipts of the company included 4,355,446 marks in subsidy from the German Government. The fourth year the total of receipts, subsidy included, fell short 571,663 marks of meeting the expense. The fifth year the loss to the company amounted to 1,937,604 marks net, above all receipts from freight, passengers, and Government subsidy, the latter alone amounting to 4,390,317 marks. The loss to the company in the three succeeding years in expenses over receipts, the latter including the subsidies received from the Government, was 2,434,933 marks, although in the same period the company received subsidies from the Government amounting to 12,936,201 marks. In the entire eight years that the company operated its ships at a loss it received from the Government 32,036,545 marks in subsidies, and it lost a net sum of 6,781,468 marks—it paid out the last-named sum in excess of what it received in freight, passenger, miscellaneous receipts, and in Government subsidies.

EFFECT OF SUBSIDIES UPON GERMAN EXPORTERS.

In the first year there was no trade between Germany and the Orient, the part of the world to which the subsidized ships were to run. The second year (1881) the freight totaled 58,477 tons, valued at 74,515,600 marks, and in 1896, ten years after the line had been established under subsidies, the freight totaled 166,575 tons, valued at 160,430,000 marks—the freight increased threefold at a double valuation. Since that time the German Government has been so well pleased with the results, in increased oriental markets for German products, that it has increased the subsidies, the steamship company increasing the number of its ships and the frequency of their sailings, with the result that there has been an enormous increase in German trade with the Orient, so great an increase, in fact, wholly due to the subsidies given to the German steamship line by the German Government, as to alarm Great Britain and to lead her manufacturers and her shipowners to suggest some measure of protection for Britons against the ruinous effects of this German competition. The ruinous effects are due to the lower freight rates made to German manufacturers by the subsidized German steamship line, freight rates far lower than competing subsidized British ships are able to make, and, were it not for the subsidies paid to the British competing line, it would be driven out of existence by the subsidized German line. The rivalry and the competition between the British and the German steamship lines inure to the advantage of German and British exporters, in that markets in distant parts of the world are opened for their products that would be closed to them were the lines not aided by the subsidies of their governments and thus able to make lower rates of freight than ever before.

EARLY DAY EFFECTS OF SUBSIDIES TO AMERICAN STEAMSHIPS.

The first subsidies given to American steamships were provided for in an act passed over sixty years ago, during the Administration of James K. Polk. Under that law, as amended in 1847, three lines of American steamships were established, two of which operated between Atlantic ports and northern Europe. The immediate effect of the establishment of the American lines was an enormous reduction in freight rates. They were at first cut in two by the competing subsidized British steamships, and subsequently they were cut in two again, so fierce was the rivalry, so determined was the competition. American ships first cut the rates, and then the British ships still further reduced rates, the advantage accruing to the American exporters. American producers were able to send abroad products that they had been denied a foreign market for, because of the high rates of ocean transportation. It is but little known in these days that three years preceding the civil war American steam tonnage was greater than that of Great Britain, American steamships made the run between the United States and England in a day less than their swiftest competitors made it, American ships had the preference, were in the lead, were superior in every respect to their foreign competitors, and all the while American exporters were reaping great advantages in low freight rates from the operation of the competing subsidized steamships.

OUR TRADE ACROSS THE PACIFIC INCREASING.

In expectation of the passage of an American ship-subsidy act, Americans a few years ago built quite a number of fine steamships in the United States, and these are being operated more largely upon the Pacific, their owners each pocketing large losses, but making rates of freight much lower to American shippers than they have ever before enjoyed, with the result that there has been a great increase in the volume of our exports to Japan, China, Australia, and New Zealand. The fine line of swift American steamships running from San Francisco to Australia, although now enjoying an annual mail subsidy of $283,000, is suffering an annual loss of $371,000 in operating its ships, and its owners have stated that they will be forced to the wall, to give up their line, or to possibly sell out to the more enterprising Japanese, if some legislative relief in the way of increased compensation is not given. Meanwhile the losses suffered by the owners of the line are favoring American exporters, who are finding increasing markets for their products, due to the low rates of freight made by the subsidized but unprofitable American steamship line. The abandonment of this line by its present owners would unquestionably greatly curtail if not wipe out our entire trade with Australia by way of Pacific ports. The increased freight rates exacted would put an end to the profit in the exportation, and the trade would cease, as far as we are concerned. These are matters well worthy the consideration of the American people, from a trade point of view, if from no other.

RETURN TO THE GOVERNMENT FROM SUBSIDIZING SHIPPING.

Some people think that there would be a dead loss if our Government were to subsidize its shipping. This is far from the truth. There would be a great gain, as has been shown, to the business men of the country. But where would the Government come in? may be asked. The return to the Government would come in through the usefulness of the ships, their trained and experienced shipmasters, officers, and men in time of need. In 1793, in a great state paper, Thomas Jefferson said:

"Our navigation involves still higher considerations; as a branch of industry it is valuable, but as a resource of defense, essential."

Note the significance of the last word in the quotation—"essential." That is the view held by all nations that subsidize their shipping—and the nations that do not subsidize their shipping have none. The ships and the men are an essential resource of the national defense, and on this ground alone, if for no other, our Government is justified in making any expenditure that may be necessary to secure merchant ships and seamen of our own. Very recently it has been pointed out by the chief officers of our Army and our Navy that a large number of ships, of varying sizes and speed, are essential to the successful prosecution of war, should we unhappily become involved in one across the seas. To leave ourselves without the essential means, the needed instrumentalities, for carrying on the war successfully, and with our commerce carried in their ships, arming and equipping our possible adversaries with those means which we have denied to ourselves the possession of, is to ignore our peril and court disaster.

It is said that Japanese shipowners are negotiating for the purchase of all of the American steamships plying across the Pacific. Is there a state or a sinister objective in this proposed purchase? Lacking ships of our own, might Japan not wrest from us the control of the Philippines, if it be true that she envies us our possession of those islands? As Jefferson truly said much more that a hundred years ago, but equally true to-day: "Our navigation involves still higher (than economical) considerations." Let us neither ignore nor forget these considerations.

CLEVELAND'S INDORSEMENT OF THE SHIPPING BILL.

[Published by the Merchant Marine League of the United States, organized at Cleveland November 21, 1904.]

Several hundred enthusiastic members of the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce, at its monthly meeting on the evening of February 20, unanimously adopted the following resolutions, that had received the unanimous indorsement of the board of directors, after extended discussion:

"Resolved, That due consideration for the broad development of our foreign commerce and for the better safety of the nation demands the restoration of a foreign merchant marine under our flag.

"Resolved, That the same purpose is being striven for and accomplished steadily by other nations in their own behalf.

"Resolved, That we regard the work of the Congressional Merchant Marine Commission as having been done with industry, fairness, and discrimination; and, therefore,

"Resolved, That we recommend the prompt enactment and careful trial of the plan evolved by the Commission and embodied in the 'Gallinger bill,' so called, which has recently passed the Senate; and

"Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be forwarded to the Senators and Representatives of Ohio in Congress."

At the request of the president, Mr. Harvey D. Goulder, president of the Merchant Marine League of the United States, presented the resolutions. Mr. Goulder very tersely and lucidly explained the existing condition and needs of our deep-sea shipping, the appointment of the Merchant Marine Commission, its labors in behalf of our marine, and explained the bill the Commission had prepared, which had but just passed the United States Senate. Mr. Goulder quoted from speeches made in the Senate, especially those of Senators GALLINGER and FRYE, and instanced many evidences of the serious consequences of our lack of a foreign-going marine. He especially pointed out the conservative and moderate features of the shipping bill and the feeling entertained by some as to the possibility of the provisions of the bill being insufficient to induce capital to enter extensively into the building of ships for our foreign trade. He pointed out that the bill had escaped in discussion in the Senate the charge of undue liberality, the opposition suggesting as reasons for their position their doubts as to the efficacy of so moderate a measure. The unanimous determination of the Commission to make provision only for cargo-carrying rather than swift steamships was explained by Mr. Goulder as conforming to the very general recommendations to that effect made to the Commission by those who had attended its public hearings.

At the conclusion of his speech Mr. Goulder was asked a number of questions regarding the features of the Commission's shipping bill, all of which he answered satisfactorily. One question was as to whether or not the subsidies provided in the Commission's bill were larger than those paid by other countries, and Mr. Goulder answered that they were not; on the contrary, in many cases they were less. He explained the enormous power exerted by England, small territorially, but potential commercially, as due to her maritime development. That the wise Emperor of Germany had discovered that through a marine under the German flag he would be able, as his people had been, to successfully compete with England for a part of her vast foreign commerce, Germany's success in the Orient proving the wisdom of Germany's large subsidies to her great steamship lines.

Following Mr. Goulder, Mr. F. F. Prentiss, a manufacturer and president of the Cleveland Twist Drill Company, who has traveled around the world, referred to the almost utter absence of the American flag in its different ports. In a trip from Marseille, by way of the Suez Canal, to Bombay, Calcutta, Singapore, Hongkong, Shanghai, Yokahama, and Hawaii, the American flag was seen but twice—once in Hongkong, floating over an American war vessel, and next in Honolulu, at the peak of an American schooner. He said that, while abroad, he had met a number of American manufacturers who, like himself, were seeking new markets for their products, and that all whom he met had stated that they had become convinced that the United States must give its aid to the building up of its foreign-going shipping, as a means for the development of foreign markets for our increasing surplus products. In a voyage to South America, which he was compelled to go to London to begin, and which included stops in Brazil and Argentina, over the mountains to Chile, and up the west coast, he had never once seen the American flag. He strongly favored subsidies for our marine development and warmly favored the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. Harry Coulby next spoke, and his remarks were both pithy and practical. Mr. Coulby is president of the Pittsburg Steamship Company, which owns a lake fleet of 100 steamships of from eight to nine thousand tons carrying capacity each, which do an enormous iron ore and coal carrying business. He pointed out that the development of our lake marine was due to Government aid, in the deepening of channels and harbors, and yet he had never heard anyone object to such improvements because the dredge owners might make a profit from the dredging. When he came to Cleveland, twenty years ago, the cost of carrying ore from the Lake Superior region was $1.50 a ton, and the cost of carrying coal up was 74 cents a ton; now if they could get 75 cents for their ore and 30 cents for their coal they were well satisfied. The benefits following the deepening of lake channels and harbors, he pointed out, had not gone to the vesselmen alone, their share had been small; the whole country had benefited in it; the farmer who put a wire fence around his farm, or the woman who used a needle, in any part of the United States, had been benefited equally with the iron-ore owners, the lake carrier, the railroads, the furnaces, and the mills. The same would be true of an American ocean-going merchant marine, he said; the whole country would benefit by it, not the vessel owners alone, but everybody. Mr. Coulby thought the provisions of the pending bill were too moderate, and he would, if he could, increase them; if they were too generous, he said there would be plenty of American ships built to compete with each other, and force rates down, and if they were insufficient, then the passage of the bill would cost the country nothing except the losses incident to the lack of a deep-sea shipping.

Col. J. J. Sullivan, president of the Central National Bank and of the Superior Trust Company, of Cleveland, who is also an ex-president of the National Board of Trade, was the last speaker, and he was both eloquent and earnest. He thought the resolutions, like the Commission's bill, were far too moderate, besides which he deplored the evident feeling of timidity with which the necessities of the situation were discussed. The time had passed when we could longer disregard the need of a deep-sea shipping, and it was time that such intelligent, such influential, and such practical organizations as the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce should express themselves with vigor and determination in demanding of Congress the fulfillment of the pledges that had so often been made in behalf of a revived American merchant marine. We needed a merchant marine; we could not get it, he explained, without the Government's assistance. It was the right of the people to receive that assistance, in order that we might quickly have a merchant marine of our own.

The remarks of the several speakers evoked frequent and spirited applause, and it was manifest that the audience was deeply interested as well as in the fullest sympathy with the purposes of the resolution. The resolutions were adopted with a ringing "aye," and there was not a dissenting vote when the "noes" were called for.

Immediately following the adoption of the shipping resolutions it was moved that a committee of three be appointed by the president to proceed to Washington and in person present to the chairman of the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee the resolutions adopted by the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce in favor of the passage of the so-called "Gallinger shipping bill." This suggestion was unanimously approved of, and in a few days the resolutions will be formally presented to Congress, and if the expressions in Washington in favor of the bill's early passage are as vigorous and as earnest as those made at the meeting of the chamber of commerce, there can be no doubt that its influence will be strongly felt.

If there remained any doubt as to where the middle western section of the United States stands on the shipping bill, the action of the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce, with its membership of 1,500 of its leading business citizens, perhaps the most active and powerful organization of its kind in the West, should go far to remove it. When similar action, as is expected, is taken in other leading middle western cities, possibly Congress will realize the insistent demand throughout the country for the passage of the shipping bill, and give proper heed to it. It is manifest that the feeling in Cleveland is very strong, and the influence of the chamber of commerce resolutions upon the Representatives in Congress from that city and from the State of Ohio can not but be decisive.

AMERICAN LABOR WILL BENEFIT MOST.

[Published by the Merchant Marine League of the United States, organized at Cleveland, November 21, 1904.]

American labor will be the chief beneficiary of the shipping bill if it is enacted. Its defeat would be a greater blow to American labor than to any other American interest. Existing conditions all favor the foreigner. They are all against the American. To keep them as they are is to favor the foreigner. To alter them would be to benefit Americans. Ships built by foreigners, of foreign materials, made by foreign workmen, commanded, officered, manned, and managed by aliens now carry 90 per cent of our imports and exports. The annual value of our foreign commerce now approximates closely to $3,000,000,000.

AMERICAN CAPITAL MAY INVEST IN FOREIGN SHIPS.

American capital is free, if it chooses, to invest in foreign-built ships, and to run them with alien masters, officers, and men, under alien flags, in our foreign trade. Our laws make no discrimination whatever in our ports as between our own and foreign ships in the carrying of our foreign commerce. Every privilege that our ships enjoy under our laws in that trade is as freely given to competing foreign ships.

A "FREE-SHIP" LAW WOULD NOT BE USED.

The mere fact that an American citizen may not place under the American flag a foreign-built ship which he purchases cuts no figure. None of the many thousand tons of foreign-built ships, now officered, manned, and managed by foreigners and sailing under foreign flags, would be placed under the American flag by their owners even if our laws permitted it. The reason for this is that the cost of operating such ships would be greater under the American than it is now under an alien flag. And the cost would be greater because the labor employed on board the American ship is far better paid and much better fed than it is on competing foreign ships.

AMERICAN CAPITAL NOW IN FOREIGN SHIPS.

A great many millions of dollars of American capital are to-day invested in ships under foreign flags, commanded, officered, manned, and managed by aliens. The only possible benefit to this country from such American ownership is that the owners' net earnings from such investment, a possible 5 per cent of the vessel's total earnings, might be expended in the United States. Foreigners enjoy all of the benefits arising from the expenditure of the remaining 95 per cent.

HOW LABOR WOULD BENEFIT IF SHIPS WERE BUILT HERE.

Were the ships built in the United States, of American materials, and commanded, officered, manned, and managed by Americans, $200,000,000 now annually paid to aliens for doing our foreign carrying would remain in the United States, affording employment for American labor in every part of the country. The money would first go to the shipowner; he would pay part of it to the shipbuilder; he would pay another part to those who outfitted and repaired his vessel; he would pay some to the men who command, officer, and man his vessel; some to those who victual the vessel; and he would retain a moderate profit for himself. The money paid to the shipbuilder would, by him, be paid in part to his workmen; some would go to makers of materials and shapes, and he would retain a profit for himself; the money paid the outfitters, to the dry docks and repairers, would, in turn, by them be paid to their workmen, in each case the employer retaining a fair profit.

SHIPS' EARNINGS WOULD REPEATEDLY EMPLOY OUR PEOPLE.

And thus the money would work back to the merchants from the hands of the workmen, and from the merchants back to the manufacturers, and from them to their workmen. Some of the earnings would go to farmers to pay them for the food they raised and the materials they produced from which clothing is manufactured. The whole sum would percolate throughout the country, alternating between employer and employee, back and forth, over and over again.

FROM RAW TO FINISHED MATERIALS LABOR WOULD BENEFIT.

From the trees standing in the forests until they were felled, logged to mills, sawn into timbers, turned into manufactures and shapes, and fitted into ships, American labor, skilled and unskilled, would benefit. From the iron ore in the mine and the coal in the mine to the finished steel product, manufactured into the different shapes required for shipbuilding, beams, angles, tees, frames, plates, bolts, nuts, rivets, American labor would benefit. The question is almost wholly one of American labor; the benefits would accrue almost wholly to American labor. The losses due to existing conditions fall almost wholly upon American labor.

THE SUBSIDY WILL GO TO LABOR, NOT TO CAPITAL.

If the Government subsidizes the ships under the American flag the money will go first to the owner, to be sure, but by him it will be paid out to American labor in increased wages in the shipyards and on board the ships. The capitalist receives the subsidy only to pay it over to the workmen whose higher wages necessitate the subsidy being paid. The subsidy is not granted to give owners a profit, but to maintain unimpaired the American standard of wages and of living. Were American ships to-day able to compete with foreign ships without Government aid, there would be no need of a subsidy, and our ships would be doing the larger part of our foreign carrying. But American ships, unaided by our Government, can not compete.

SUBSIDY MEASURES DIFFERENCE BETWEEN AMERICAN AND FOREIGN WAGES.

The pending shipping bill fixes as the mount of the aid the difference in the sum that the American owner has to pay out for his ship, when having it built in an American shipyard, as compared with its cost in a foreign shipyard; and the further amount of difference in the wages paid to those employed on board American ships, as compared with the wages paid on competing foreign ships; and the difference in the cost of the food supplied to American, as compared with the cost of food supplied to foreign crews. Still, again, there is the difference in the subsidies and bounties and other forms of aid foreign ships receive from their governments, to the disadvantage of the American ship. The measure of all of these, and only the measure, is the sum fixed in the subsidy. So that, when the American owner of the American-built ship, which is commanded, officered, and manned by Americans, has received the subsidy from our Government, he has merely received back the excess he has expended in wages for the building and running of his ship in competition with foreign ships. His profits are about the same as those enjoyed by his foreign competitors.

WELL-PAID AMERICAN OR ILL-PAID FOREIGN LABOR—WHICH?

American labor is denied employment in our shipyards and on board of our ships, and foreign labor is employed in the building and running of ships for our foreign trade, only because the former is well paid and the latter is ill paid. If our imports and exports could only be carried in American-built ships, officered, and manned by Americans, then they would be built in this country and run by our citizens. But such is not the case. The foreigner steps in and does the work because the American workmen employed in the shipyards and on board the ships will not accept the foreign rates of wages.

PLEA FOR LABOR—NOT FOR CAPITAL.

Every claim upon which the demand for subsidies is based is because of the exactions of high-priced, well-paid American labor. The American workman will not lower the American wage standard; he will not consent to accept the foreign standard of wages or of living. If he would, capital would build ships in this country from American materials; Americans would command, officer, and man them. Until the Government makes good to American capital the higher cost of building ships in this country and of operating them under our flag, as compared with the cost of building and operating foreign ships, the alien, with his low wage and his lower standard of living, will build and run the ships to carry our foreign commerce.

NO SUBSIDY, NO EMPLOYMENT FOR AMERICAN LABOR.

With no subsidy to make good these differences to the American owner there will be no employment of American workmen in our shipyards in building ships for our foreign trade, and there will be no employment for American shipmasters, officers, and seamen in running them. American labor will not succumb to the foreign standard, and American capital will not be willing to suffer the losses incident to the building of ships in this country and running them with Americans. In short, neither capital nor labor will accept a loss. Capital finds investment elsewhere and labor remains unemployed.

THE GOVERNMENT'S INTEREST IN SHIPS AND MEN.

The Government's justification for the payment of subsidies to American vessel owners lies in the fact that the ships and their trained and experienced men are essential to, and would be protective of, the United States in time of trouble. The ships and the men are essential to the national defense. Lacking merchant ships and trained men, the nation is in peril. This justifies the expenditures in the way of subsidies and bounties by our Government, in order that the Government may have the ships and the men. It is the chief ground upon which they are justified by foreign governments that pay, in the aggregate, upward of $27,000,000 annually to foreign ships in the way of subsidies, bounties, and other aids.

BRITISH STEAMSHIP CONTRACTS—COPIES OF AGREEMENTS BETWEEN THE BRITISH ADMIRALTY AND THE INTERNATIONAL MERCANTILE MARINE COMPANY OF THE UNITED STATES; ALSO, BETWEEN THE BRITISH ADMIRALTY AND THE CUNARD STEAMSHIP COMPANY, 1903.

[From the Summary of Commerce and Finance for July, 1903.]

The following is a copy of the agreement made on August 1, 1903, between the British Admiralty and Board of Trade, as party of the first part, and the International Mercantile Marine Company of the United States, as party of the second part, with reference to the relation which British-owned vessels, controlled by that company, shall hold to the British Government; also, the agreement made on July 30, 1903, between the British Government and the Cunard Steamship Company relative to future services and the construction of two modern swift steamers for mail and parcel service between Liverpool and New York.

These copies of agreements were presented in Parliament and published by the British Government, and are herewith reproduced in the form so published.

Copy of an agreement (dated August 1, 1903) between the Admiralty and the Board of Trade and the International Mercantile Marine Company and the Oceanic Steam Navigation Company (Limited), Frederick Leyland & Co. (1900) (Limited), the British and North Atlantic Steam Navigation Company (Limited), the Mississippi and Dominion Steamship Company (Limited), the Atlantic Transport Company (Limited), and the International Navigation Company (Limited).

An agreement made the 1st day of August, 1903, between the commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the Board of Trade (for and on behalf of His Majesty's Government), of the first part; the International Mercantile Marine Company (formerly known as the International Navigation Company), being a corporation incorporated and registered under the laws of the State of New Jersey, in the United States of America, which company is hereinafter referred to as "the American company," of the second part, and the Oceanic Steam Navigation Company (Limited), Frederick Leyland & Co. (1900) (Limited), the British and North Atlantic Steam Navigation Company (Limited), the Mississippi and Dominion Steamship Company (Limited), the Atlantic Transport Company (Limited), and the International Navigation Company (Limited), of the third part.

Whereas the party of the second part owns a controlling interest in the shares of the International Navigation Company (Limited), which owns a majority of the shares of the other companies, parties of the third part;

And whereas the term "the association," hereinafter used, means the parties hereto of the second and third parts, and also includes any other company, corporate or unincorporate, partnership, body, or person, whether British, American, or other foreign, which by any arrangement is admitted to or brought under the control of the association or any of its constituent parts for the time being;

And whereas the parties hereto of the third part are hereinafter referred to as "the British companies included in the association;"

And whereas in the month of September, 1902, an agreement substantially to the effect of the provisions hereinafter contained was negotiated and made by and between His Majesty's Government and the American company, acting on behalf of the association;

And whereas it is considered desirable that such agreement as last aforesaid shall be embodied in a formal instrument, to be executed not only by the American company, but also by the British companies included in the association:

Now, these presents witness that in consideration of the stipulations hereinafter contained on the part of the American company and the British companies included in the association, the parties of the first part hereby undertake as follows:

1. The British companies included in the association shall, so long as the stipulations on their part and on the part of the American company hereinafter contained are duly observed, continue to be treated as heretofore on the same footing of general equality with other British companies in respect of any services, naval, military, or postal, which His Majesty's Government may desire to have rendered by the British mercantile marine; provided that nothing in this agreement contained shall extend to vessels of uncommercial speed which His Majesty's Government may specially require to be constructed and which are primarily designed for service in time of war.

And these presents also witness that in consideration of the undertaking hereinbefore contained on the part of the parties hereto of the first part the American company and the British companies included in the association hereby agree as follows:

2. The British companies included in the association shall be and continue to be British companies, qualified to own British ships, and a majority at least of their directors shall be British subjects.

3. No British ship in the association, nor any ship which may hereafter be built or otherwise acquired for any British company included in the association, shall be transferred to a foreign registry (without the written consent of the president of the board of trade, which shall not be unreasonably withheld) nor be nor remain upon a foreign registry. Nothing shall be otherwise done whereby any such ship would lose its British registry or its right to fly the British flag.

4. British ships in the association, and ships that may hereafter be built or otherwise acquired for any British company included in the association, shall be officered by British subjects, and as regards their crews shall carry the same proportional number of British sailors of all classes as His Majesty's Government may prescribe or arrange for in the case of any other British line engaged in the same trades.

5. Subject to the existing agreement between the Admiralty and the Oceanic Steam Navigation Company (Limited), and without prejudice to the provisions therein contained, the American company and any British company included in the association shall sell or let on hire at any time during the continuance of this agreement to the Admiralty, when required so to do by the Admiralty, any British ship in the association, and any ship hereafter to be built or otherwise acquired for any British company included in the association which the Admiralty may from time to time select. The terms of purchase or hire, if not otherwise agreed on, shall be similar to those contained in the existing agreement aforesaid.

6. At least a moiety of the tonnage built and at least a moiety of the tonnage otherwise acquired for the association in each successive period of three years (commencing from the date of this agreement), including a reasonable proportion of the faster classes of vessels, shall be built or acquired, as the case may be, for British companies included in the association and shall be registered as British ships. There shall not be reckoned in ascertaining the moiety of the tonnage so built or otherwise acquired: (a) Vessels of the exceptional class referred to in article 1, which may be constructed by special arrangement with the Government of the United States of America; (b) any vessel not already in the association purchased for the association from owners other than British subjects or American citizens or subjects or companies or bodies subject to a British or American jurisdiction, provided that such last-mentioned vessels are existing ships which have been running for at least two years prior to the contract for purchase and have not been built or acquired directly or indirectly for the association.

7. If at any time hereafter any British company (not being a party hereto), or any British partnership, body, or person, shall be admitted to or brought under the control of the association or any of its constituent parts for the time being, then, and in every such case, subject and without prejudice to any agreement then existing between such company, partnership, body, or person and His Majesty's Government, and subject and without prejudice to any agreement which may be made in view of such admission or inclusion between the American company, or other person or body acting for the association, on the one hand, and His Majesty's Government on the other hand, all the provisions of these presents shall inure for the benefit of and bind such company, partnership, body, or person, as the case may be, in like manner as if such company, partnership, body, or person had been a party hereto of the third part, and had been comprised in the expression "the British companies included in the association," as used in this agreement, and, except with the consent of His Majesty's Government, no such British company, partnership, body, or person as aforesaid shall be admitted to or brought under the control of the association or any of its constituent parts for the time being otherwise than upon the terms specified in this clause.

8. If at any time hereafter during the continuance of this agreement any other company, whether corporate or unincorporate, partnership, body, or person, whether British, American, or other foreign, shall be admitted to or brought under the control of the association or any of its constituent parts for the time being the association shall give notice thereof to His Majesty's Government, and shall furnish all such particulars with regard to terms, parties, or otherwise as the Government may reasonably require.

9. The American company and the British companies included in the association and any British company, partnership, body, or person hereafter admitted to or brought under the control of the association, or any of its constituent parts, for the time being, will forthwith and from time to time do and cause to be done all such further acts, and execute or cause to be executed all such further documents and take all such steps as may be necessary to give full legal and binding effect to this agreement.

And these presents lastly witness that it is hereby mutually agreed as follows:

10. This agreement shall have effect for twenty years from the 27th of September, 1902, and shall continue in force thereafter subject to a notice of five years on either side (which may be given during the continuance of this agreement), provided that His Majesty's Government shall have the right to terminate this agreement at any time if the association pursue a policy injurious to the interests of the British mercantile marine or of British trade.

11. This agreement shall be construed and take effect as a contract made in England and in accordance with the law of England. The American company hereby irrevocably appoints the chairman for the time being of the British committee of the association, or if there be no such chairman, then each and every British company in the association to be the agent or agents in England of the American company for the purpose of accepting service on behalf of the American company of any process, notice, or other document in respect of any matter arising out of this agreement, and service of any such process, notice, or document on such chairman or company, as aforesaid, shall be deemed to be good service on the American company. Any notice or document sent by registered post addressed to the American company at No. 22 Old Broad street, London, or to the registered office of any British company in the association shall also be deemed to have been duly served on the American company.

12. In case of any difference as to the intent and meaning of this agreement, or in case of any dispute arising out of this agreement, the same shall be referred to the lord high chancellor of Great Britain for the time being, whose decision, whether on law or fact, shall be final.

As witness the hands and seals of two of the before-mentioned commissioners and the seal of the board of trade, parties hereto of the first part, and the corporate seals of the parties hereto of the second and third parts.

Copy of an agreement between the Admiralty, the Board of Trade, and the postmaster-general and the Cunard Steamship Company (Limited) (dated July 30, 1903), with Treasury minute thereon (dated July 31, 1903), together with copies of memorandum and articles of association of the Cunard Steamship Company (Limited) and draft trust deed for securing debenture stock.

[Treasury minute, dated July 31, 1903.]

My Lords have had before them Part II of an agreement dated the 30th July, 1903, between His Majesty's Government and the Cunard Steamship Company (Limited) providing for the conveyance of His Majesty's mails between Liverpool and Queenstown on the one hand and New York on the other hand.

Part II of this agreement is in substitution for an agreement dated the 31st of July, 1899, between the postmaster-general and the company, providing for the conveyance of mails from Liverpool and Queenstown to New York, and of parcel mails from as well as to New York, the payments being made according to the weight of mails carried and the agreement being terminable by twelve months' notice. The new agreement substitutes for payments by weight a fixed annual payment of £68,000 during the currency of the contract, the natural term of which will be twenty years from the date of the first sailing of the second of two new steamships which are to be provided under Part I. Under the old agreement the payments have increased from £58,000 in the first year to £62,000 in the latest (round figures), and in view of the further increase which might reasonably have been expected the subsidy has been fixed at £68,000 a year. Under the new agreement the mails will be carried at a higher average speed than at present, as the company will be bound to use their best ships in the service, including the two swift steamers to be provided under Part I. The subsidy is to cover the conveyance of parcel mails (at present paid for separately) up to a limit of 100 tons measurement in each direction and in each week. Under the old agreement no penalties were provided, but under the new agreement a proportionate deduction from the subsidy is to be made if the company fails to perform the stipulated services.

My Lords approve of the terms of this agreement.

[An agreement with His Majesty's Government and the Cunard Steamship Company (Limited).]

An agreement made the 30th day of July, 1903, between the commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland (hereinafter referred to as "the Admiralty"), the Board of Trade, and the Right Honorable Joseph Austen Chamberlain, M. P., His Majesty's postmaster-general (hereinafter called "the postmaster-general," in which expression his successors in office, His Majesty's postmaster-general for the time being, are respectively intended to be included), for and on behalf of His Majesty, of the one part, and the Cunard Steamship Company (Limited) (hereinafter referred to as "the company"), of the other part.

Whereas the company was registered on the 23d day of May, 1878, with a capital of £2,000,000, divided into 100,000 shares, of £20 each, and there have been issued of such shares 60,000, upon which the sum of £20 per share has been paid and 40,000 upon which the sum of £10 per share has been paid;

And whereas since the registration of the company alterations have from time to time been made in its articles of association, and the print of the memorandum and articles of association hereunto annexed is a true copy of the memorandum and articles of association of the company now in force;

And whereas the company has since its formation maintained lines of steamships running between (1) Liverpool and New York; (2) Liverpool and Boston, in the United States of America; (3) Liverpool and Mediterranean ports, and (4) Liverpool and Havre, and the vessels engaged in such services, or some of them, have been employed and are under the provisions of an agreement dated the 31st day of July, 1899, and made between the then postmaster-general, of the one part, and the company, of the other part, now employed by the postmaster-general in the carriage of mails;

And whereas the company is the absolute owner of the steamships particularized in the first schedule hereto, free from incumbrances; and it has been agreed for the purposes of this agreement that such steamships were on the 29th day of September, 1902, of the respective values set opposite to their names respectively in the said schedule;

And whereas the company has in contemplation the building of two steamships of large size and having a speed of from 24 to 25 knots per hour, to be run in its line between Liverpool and New York, or between other ports in Great Britain and the United States of America;

And whereas by an agreement bearing date the 24th day of October, 1902, and made between the Admiralty (for and on behalf of His Majesty), of the one part, and the company, of the other part, the company agreed for the considerations therein appearing to hold at the disposal of the Admiralty for the purpose of either hire or purchase certain vessels the property of the company upon the terms and conditions therein appearing;

And whereas His Majesty's Government is desirous that the company's lines should be maintained under the British flag and British management and to the best advantage, and that they should be further improved by the addition of the two contemplated steamships;

And whereas His Majesty's Government is further desirous of securing the right to acquire at any time during the term of this agreement, either on hire or by purchase, all or any of the steamships for the time being the property of the company;

And whereas it has been arranged that His Majesty's mails shall be conveyed by the steamships of the company during the term of this agreement in manner and upon the terms hereinafter specified;

And whereas for the considerations herein appearing the parties hereto have agreed to enter into the agreements on their parts respectively herein contained;

Now it is hereby agreed between the parties hereto—

PART I.—Special arrangements.

1. (1) All references to His Majesty's Government in this agreement shall be deemed to be references to the Admiralty, the board of trade, and the postmaster-general acting jointly, and all acts and notices which may under this agreement be done or given by His Majesty's Government shall be done or given jointly by the Admiralty, the board of trade, and the postmaster-general, and all notices to be given to His Majesty's Government under this agreement shall be given to or served on the Admiralty, the board of trade, and the postmaster-general, respectively.

(2) All references to vessels substituted for the two steamships referred to in clause 3 hereof, or either of them, shall be deemed to include a reference to any vessel substituted for any vessel already so substituted.

2. This agreement is conditional on the company's articles of association being altered by special resolution in the terms set forth in the second schedule hereto.

3. (1) The company shall forthwith cause to be built for it in the United Kingdom, with all due dispatch, two steamships of large size, capable of maintaining a minimum average ocean speed of from 24 to 25 knots an hour in moderate weather, suitable in all respects to maintain and develop the company's line between Liverpool and New York or other ports in Great Britain and the United States of America.

(2) The company shall, before the building of such steamships is started, submit the plans and specifications to the Admiralty, and, if requested so to do by the Admiralty within one month from the date of the submission of such plans and specifications, shall modify the same to meet the reasonable requirements of the Admiralty; and each such steamship shall be constructed in accordance with such plans or modified plans to the satisfaction of such inspector as may from time to time be agreed on by the Admiralty and the company, or in default of agreement appointed by the president of the chamber of shipping for the United Kingdom, for the time being such inspector as aforesaid being employed at the joint expense of the Admiralty and the company; provided that such joint employment shall not affect or diminish the liability of the company in the event of such steamship not fulfilling the conditions of this agreement.

4. (1) The company shall at all times during the term of this agreement hold all and every the vessels for the time being the property of the company (including the steamships particularized in the first schedule hereto and the two steamships referred to in clause 3 hereof, and all other vessels built for or purchased or otherwise acquired by the company as and when the same shall have been built, purchased, or otherwise acquired, and so long as such steamships or vessels or any of them shall remain the property of the company) at the disposal of His Majesty's Government, to be hired or purchased upon the terms and conditions set forth in the third schedule hereto.

(2) His Majesty's Government shall have the right, on giving notice in writing to the company of their intention so to do, to take possession of any vessel which they require to purchase or hire under the provisions of this agreement immediately on the arrival of such vessel at her port of discharge from the voyage on which such vessel shall be engaged at the time of the receipt by the company of such notice and after the discharge of her inward cargo; provided that in case such vessel at the time of such notice has been let out on a charter party by the company in accordance with subclause (8) of the next following clause hereof, then and in that case His Majesty's Government shall be only entitled to take possession of such vessel subject to such charter party.

5. The company agree at all times during the term of this agreement as follows:

(1) The registered and head office of the company shall be in Great Britain, and the business of the company shall be carried on there.

(2) His Majesty's Government may determine the next following clause hereof and withhold the payment to be made thereunder if the memorandum and articles of association of the company shall, after the same shall have been altered in accordance with clause 2 hereof and the second schedule thereto, be altered so far as affects the provisions referred to in the said last-mentioned clause and the said second schedule without the previous consent in writing of His Majesty's Government, or if the company shall persistently fail to observe the provisions of articles 2, 23*a*, and 30*a* of the said articles of association, when altered as aforesaid, or if the company makes default in observing or performing any of the provisions of subclauses (8), (13), and (14) of this clause.

(3) To carry on its business to the best advantage.

(4) Not to unduly raise the freights or charges for the carriage of goods in any of its services.

(5) In the fixing of such freights and charges to give no undue preference as against British subjects.

(6) To submit to the Admiralty the plans of any new vessels, other than the two steamships referred to in clause 3 hereof, which the company may intend to build to attain a speed of 17 knots or upward, and if requested so to do by the Admiralty within one month from the date of the submission of such plans, to modify such plans to meet the reasonable requirements of the Admiralty, but so that (except in the case of vessels to which the following proviso relates) the company shall not be bound to modify such plans to meet the requirements of the Admiralty when in the bona fide opinion of the company such modifications would be incompatible with the use of the vessel in question for mercantile purposes or for the purposes of the company's business; provided that in the case of any such intended vessel as aforesaid being built in substitution for either of the two steamships referred to in clause 3 hereof, such vessel shall be constructed in accordance with such plans or modified plans to the satisfaction of such inspector as may from time to time be agreed on by the Admiralty and the company, or in default of agreement, appointed by the president of the chamber of shipping for the United Kingdom, for the time being such inspector as aforesaid being employed at the joint expense of the Admiralty and the company; provided that such joint employment shall not affect or diminish the liability of the company in the event of the vessel which is being built in substitution as aforesaid not fulfilling the conditions of this agreement.

(7) To afford to the Admiralty at all reasonable times every facility for fitting on board all or any of the vessels forming the fleet for the time being of the company such fittings and arrangements for their armament in the event of their being taken for use as armed cruisers as the Admiralty may think fit, but not so as to interfere with the vessels in their ordinary employment or use for the purposes of the company's business, and, if required, without charge, to keep and maintain in clean order any racers, fittings, and mountings that may be provided by the Admiralty in the company's storehouse at Liverpool, ready to be immediately fitted on board by the Admiralty at their own expense; provided that the company shall not be required to provide more than 15,000 cubic feet of space, with 1,000 square feet of floor space, in such storehouse.

(8) Not to let out on a charter party (except to the Indian government) any vessel for the time being the property of the company of a speed of 17 knots or upward unless the company shall have previously given seven days' notice of its intention so to do to His Majesty's Government, accompanied by such evidence of the bona fide nature of the contemplated charter as shall be reasonably satisfactory to His Majesty's Government; provided that the company shall be at liberty at any time after the expiration of such seven days to enter into such charter for any period not exceeding six months unless His Majesty's Government shall in the meantime have signified to the company, in writing, that it exercises its right, under clause 4 hereof, to either purchase or hire such vessel; provided, also, that the company shall not, without the consent, in writing, of His Majesty's Government, let out on a charter party any vessel (whether or not of the speed of 17 knots or upward) which is or has at any time during the previous twelve months been ordinarily employed as a mail ship under this agreement; but this proviso shall not extend to a vesel whose place in the ordinary mail service has been taken by a newly built or acquired faster vessel if the company has, at the time of entering into the charter, a sufficient number of fast vessels efficiently to maintain the mail service.

(9) To secure (a) that on all vessels for the time being the property of the company, including the two steamships referred to in clause 3 hereof, the master, officers, and engineers in charge of a watch on board shall always be British subjects, and that three-fourths of the crew shall be British subjects, unless in the case of the crew the company is prevented from fulfilling this obligation owing to strikes, lockouts, or other labor disturbances; and (b) that on the Campania, Lucania, and Umbria, so long as neither of the two steamships referred to in clause 3 hereof shall have started on its first voyage, and thereafter on the Campania and Umbria and the steamship which has so started, until the second of the said steamships shall have started on its first voyage, and thereafter on the two steamships referred to in clause 3 hereof, or any vessels or vessel which may under the provision hereof be substituted therefor for the time being, all certificated officers, other than engineers, and not less than one-half of the crew carried (unless in the case of the crew the company is prevented from fulfilling this obligation owing to strikes, lockouts, or other labor disturbances), shall belong to the royal naval reserve or the royal naval fleet reserve; provided that in the event of any vessel to which this provision applies being lost His Majesty's Government may by notice in writing make this provision applicable to such other vessel of the company's fleet for the time being as His Majesty's Government may select in lieu of the vessel so lost.

For the average deficiency (if any) in each year in the number borne in any such vessel as aforesaid below the proportion of men belonging to the royal naval reserve or royal naval fleet reserve in this subclause mentioned, unless it shall be determined by arbitration under clause 35 hereof that such deficiency has not been due to any default or neglect on the part of the company, liquidated damages at the rate of £12 a head shall be payable by the company to His Majesty's Government, and such damages may be deducted from any monthly installment of the annual sum payable by His Majesty's Government under the next following clause hereof, or from any money payable under the agreement of the 24th day of October, 1902, or may be otherwise recovered as His Majesty's Government shall think fit.

The company shall furnish in each year to the Admiralty a return showing the numbers of royal naval reserve or royal naval fleet reserve officers, engineers, and men borne in each vessel during the preceding year, distinguishing the classes of seamen and firemen. The return shall also show the total number of officers, engineers, crew, and firemen borne during the period.

For the purposes of this subclause the expression "crew" shall not include persons exclusively employed in the engine department or in attending to the passengers and their wants, such as stewards, etc.

As regards the complement of the engine department in the vessels to which the foregoing provisions relate and the crews (including the complement of the engine department) of all other vessels of a speed of 17 knots and upward for the time being the property of the company, the company will use their best endeavors and do all that is reasonably possible to secure the employment of the largest possible proportion of members of the royal naval reserve and the royal naval fleet reserve.

(10) To keep the vessels for the time being the property of the company (except such vessels as may for the time being be at the risk of the Admiralty) in a thoroughly seaworthy condition and good repair throughout, and to use their best endeavors to maintain the steamships constructed under clause 3 hereof, and any vessels or vessel substituted for such steamships, or either of them, under the provisions of this agreement, in such condition as to be capable of maintaining a minimum average ocean speed of 24½ knots an hour in moderate weather, and to permit His Majesty's Government at all reasonable times (but so as not to interfere with the regular employment of the vessels) to inspect all vessels for the time being the property of the company whenever they desire to do so, in order to see that such vessels are kept in such condition as aforesaid. In the event of His Majesty's Government being of opinion on any such survey that the said vessels or any one or more of them are not in such condition, His Majesty's Government may give notice in writing to the company to that effect and require the company to put such vessels or vessel in such condition, and the company shall forthwith at the cost and charge of the company comply with such notice.

(11) Within three months after the expiration of every year, calculated from the date when the vessel as to the speed of which proof is required under this subclause starts on her first voyage, to adduce to His Majesty's Government such reasonable proof from the actual running of the vessels as His Majesty's Government may require that each of the two steamships mentioned in clause 3 hereof, or any vessel built under the provisions of this agreement in substitution for either of such steamships, has during the preceding year been capable of maintaining a minimum average ocean speed of 24½ knots an hour in moderate weather.

(12) To permit the Admiralty to make at their own cost all reasonable provision (but not so as to interfere with the gangways of the vessels in their ordinary employment, or otherwise to interfere with the use of the vessels for mercantile purposes or for the purposes of the company's business) for the fitting of such pillars and supports, or the making of such other arrangements, as to enable guns to be carried on any vessel for the time being the property of the company if and when the same shall be purchased or hired by the Admiralty under this agreement.

(13) To register and keep registered all vessels the property for the time being of the company under the British flag, and not by any act or omission to lose or endanger the British registry or the right to fly the British flag.

(14) To sell no vessel of the speed of 17 knots or upward for the time being the property of the company without the previous consent in writing of His Majesty's Government; provided that such consent shall not be unreasonably withheld, particularly in the case of vessels which shall no longer be suitable by reason of age, depreciation, or otherwise for the company's business; provided that if any dispute arise as to whether any such consent is or is not being unreasonably withheld then in the case of a proposed sale of either of the two steamships mentioned in clause 3 hereof, or of any vessel built in substitution for either of such steamships, or of the Campania or Lucania, the decision of His Majesty's Government shall be final and conclusive, but in any other case the matter shall be referred to arbitration under clause 35 hereof; and in making his award the arbitrator shall take into consideration all the then existing obligations of the company toward His Majesty's Government; provided, also, that the company shall not, without the consent in writing of His Majesty's Government sell any vessel (whether or not of the speed of 17 knots or upward) which is or has at any time during the previous twelve months been ordinarily employed as a mail ship under this agreement; but this proviso shall not extend to a vessel whose place in the ordinary mail service has been taken by a newly built or acquired faster vessel if the company has at the time of sale a sufficient number of fast vessels efficiently to maintain the mail service.

(15) To sell no vessel of the speed of under 17 knots without giving seven days' previous notice in writing to His Majesty's Government, and allowing His Majesty's Government the option of purchasing such vessel under clause 4 of this agreement.

6. His Majesty's Government shall, subject in all respects to the provisions of the next two following clauses hereof, pay to the company during the term of this agreement, out of such aids or supplies as may for the time being be provided or appropriated by Parliament for the purpose, the sum of £150,000 per annum, as to £75,000, part thereof, as from the date upon which the first of the two steamships referred to in clause 3 hereof shall sail on her first voyage, and as to £75,000, the balance thereof, as from the date upon which the second of such steamships shall sail on her first voyage. Such annual payments shall be made by equal monthly installments on the first day of the month; provided that only a proportionate part of the annual payment calculated from the date upon which each of such steamships shall sail on her first voyage shall be paid on the first day of the month next succeeding the day upon which the steamship (upon the sailing of which such installment shall become payable) shall sail on her first voyage.

7. If in the case of either of the two steamships mentioned in clause 3 hereof, or any vessel substituted therefor, the company shall, before such steamship sails on her first voyage, fail to adduce to the satisfaction of the Admiralty reasonable proof from trials that such vessel will be capable of maintaining a minimum average ocean speed of 24½ knots an hour in moderate weather, but shall prove to the like satisfaction that such vessel will be capable of maintaining an average ocean speed of not less than 23½ knots an hour under such conditions as aforesaid, then such deduction shall be made from the annual payment of £150,000 to be made by His Majesty's Government under the last preceding clause hereof as shall be agreed upon, or failing such agreement, shall be determined by arbitration by an arbitrator appointed by the lord chief justice for the time being, and the decision of such arbitrator shall be final.

And whereas the amount of the said annual payment mentioned in the last preceding clause of this agreement has been arrived at upon consideration (1) of the special value to the Admiralty of the provision by the company of two steamships of the high rate of speed mentioned in clause 3 hereof; and (2) of the fact that the present fleet of the company consists of the vessels specified in the first schedule hereto; and (3) of the other obligations and services to be undertaken and rendered by the company toward His Majesty's Government under this agreement. Now it is hereby agreed and declared that if either of the said two new steamships referred to in clause 3 hereof, or any vessel substituted therefor, shall not before such vessel sails on her first voyage be proved to the reasonable satisfaction of the Admiralty to be capable of maintaining a minimum average ocean speed of 23½ knots an hour in moderate weather, then the special value of such vessel to the Admiralty, so far as regards speed, shall be deemed not to exist, and the annual payment of £150,000 shall be reduced to such an amount as in default of agreement may be determined by arbitration by an arbitrator appointed by the lord chief justice for the time being in manner aforesaid; provided that in fixing the reduced amount of such payment, under the provisions of this paragraph, the arbitrator shall have regard to the fact that an annual payment of £10,000 has been accepted by the company under clause 6 of the agreement hereinbefore mentioned, dated the 24th day of October, 1902, in respect of a vessel having an average continuous ocean speed in ordinary weather of not less than 21 knots an hour; and in fixing, either under this or the first paragraph of this clause, the amount to be paid the arbitrator shall take into consideration as well the additional cost of building and running a vessel capable of maintaining a higher speed than 21 knots an hour under the conditions aforesaid, as also the obligations and services undertaken and rendered by the company by virtue of this agreement; provided also that the amount fixed under the provisions of this clause shall not be liable to reduction under the provisions of the next following clause hereof unless the said vessels or either of them shall fail to maintain as an average ocean speed in moderate weather the speed in respect of which the arbitrator has fixed such reduced amount; and provided further that if the company shall subsequently to any arbitration satisfy the Admiralty that the speed of the said vessels or either of them has been increased, and that the said vessels or either of them can maintain an average ocean speed in moderate weather exceeding 23½ knots, the amount of the said annual payment shall be proportionately increased to an amount to be agreed between the Admiralty and the company, or failing agreement, to be settled by arbitration by an arbitrator appointed by the lord chief justice for the time being in manner aforesaid, it being the intention of the parties that if and so soon as the company shall satisfy the Admiralty that they have remedied in every respect their initial failure to comply with the obligations of this agreement with respect to the two steamships referred to in clause 3 hereof, or any vessel substituted therefor, the said annual payment shall, subject to any deductions to be made under the next ensuing clause hereof, be increased to £150,000, but shall in no event exceed that sum.

8. And in view of the considerations recited in the last preceding clause hereof it is hereby further agreed and declared that if at any time during the continuance of this agreement (a) there be a total loss, actual or constructive, or capture of either of the two steamships mentioned in clause 3 hereof, or of any vessel built in substitution therefor; or (b) either of such steamships or any vessel built in substitution as aforesaid be not shown in manner provided by clause 5 (11) hereof in any year by actual running to be capable of maintaining as aforesaid a minimum average ocean speed in moderate weather of 24½ knots an hour, or become less efficient (reasonable wear and tear excepted) than the same was when constructed, and steps be not forthwith taken to make good such loss of efficiency; or (c) the company's fleet (other than the two steamships mentioned in clause 3 hereof, or any vessel built in substitution as aforesaid) become less efficient than the same now is (reasonable wear and tear excepted) and steps be not forthwith taken to make good such loss of efficiency; or (d) the other obligations and services to be undertaken and rendered by the company as aforesaid be not duly observed and rendered, then and in every such case the annual payment to be made by His Majesty's Government under clause 6 hereof shall be reduced by such a sum as shall be agreed upon between His Majesty's Government and the company, or, failing such agreement, shall be fixed by arbitration under clause 35 hereof; provided that if the company shall with all due dispatch after either of the said two steamships or any vessel built in substitution therefor shall have been lost or captured as aforesaid proceed to build in substitution therefor a vessel fulfilling in all respects the conditions of this agreement, with respect to the vessel so lost or captured, and shall with regard to such vessel observe the provisions of clause 5 (6) hereof, the annual payment under clause 6 hereof shall not, during the building of such vessel, be reduced by reason of the loss or capture of the vessel in substitution for which the same is being built; provided also that if His Majesty's Government purchase either of the said two steamships or any vessel built in substitution therefor the purchase shall for the purpose of this clause be equivalent to a total loss of the steamship or vessel purchased, except that the company shall not be at liberty without the written request of His Majesty's Government to build a vessel similar to the steamships referred to in clause 3 hereof in substitution for the steamship or vessel so purchased; but nothing herein contained shall limit the right of the company to use the purchase price for the purpose of building or purchasing any vessel or vessels suitable for the purposes of the company.

In any arbitration held under the provisions of this clause the arbitrator shall give special consideration to any diminution in value for Admiralty purposes of the fleet of the company or any vessel thereof by reason or default in or breach of any of the provisions of this agreement in relation to the speed of any vessel or otherwise.

9. Up to the date upon which the first £75,000 shall become payable under clause 6 hereof, all sums which but for this agreement would be payable by His Majesty's Government to the company under the provisions of the hereinbefore recited agreement of the 24th day of October, 1902, shall continue to be paid, and as from that date until the second £75,000 shall become payable under the said last-mentioned clause hereof, one moiety of all sums which but for this agrement would be payable by His Majesty's Government to the company under the said agreement on the 24th day of October, 1902, shall continue to be paid. Except for the purpose of this clause, the said agreement of the 24th day of October, 1902, is hereby terminated.

10. His Majesty's Government shall advance to the company a sum equal to the cost to the company of the two steamships referred to in clause 3 hereof, but not exceeding in any event £2,600,000, upon the terms and conditions following:

(a) The loan shall be secured by a charge upon the whole of the company's assets, including the steamships particularized in the first schedule hereto and the two steamships referred to in clause 3 hereof, and all other vessels built for or purchased or otherwise acquired by the company, so long as such steamships or vessels or any of them shall remain the property of the company.

(b) Such charge shall be secured by the company by a trust deed and by mortgages on the steamships particularized in the first schedule hereto and on the two steamships referred to in clause 3 hereof, and otherwise as more particularly provided by the trust deed, and such trust deed shall be framed in the terms of the draft hereunto annexed, which, for the purpose of identification, has been subscribed by the president of the board of trade and the chairman of the company.

(c) The loan shall be advanced by installments, on the inspector referred to in clause 3 hereof certifying that the provisions of such clause have been complied with up to the date of such certificate as and when the installments to be paid by the company on account of the cost of the two steamships referred to in clause 3 hereof shall become payable, and to a like amount.

(d) The loan shall carry interest (and without regard to the dates of the actual payment of the several advance installments) as from the following dates; that is to say, on one-half part thereof as from the day upon which the first of the two steamships referred to in clause 3 hereof shall sail on her first voyage, and on the other half part thereof as from the day upon which the second of such steamships shall sail on her first voyage.

(e) The interest payable on so much of the loan as shall for the time being be due shall be at the rate of 2½ per cent per annum.

(f) The loan shall be repaid by the company by annual installments, each of which shall be equal to one-twentieth of the total amount of the advance. The first of such installments shall be payable at the expiration of one year from the date upon which the second of the steamships referred to in clause 3 hereof shall sail on her first voyage.

11. The company shall, as soon as the articles of association of the company shall have been altered as aforesaid, issue to two nominees of His Majesty's Government one £20 share of the company, carrying the same voting power and other rights and privileges as an ordinary £20 share of the company, but for the purpose of demanding a poll in respect of and voting against any special resolution involving any alteration of the company's articles of association so far as respects the provisions referred to in clause 2 hereof and the second schedule hereto, also carrying the following additional rights and privileges; that is to say, (a) the right to demand a poll upon the occasion of any such special resolution as aforesaid, and (b) the right to give against any such special resolution as aforesaid additional votes equal in number to one-fourth of the number of votes possessed by the company's share, stock, or debenture holders for the time being.

PART II.—Carriage of mails.

12. For all the purposes of this agreement the term "mails" means and includes all bags, boxes, baskets, or other packages of letters and other postal packets, including parcels, without regard either to the country or place to which such pakages may be addressed or to the country or place in which they may have originated, and also all empty bags, boxes, baskets, or other receptacles, and all stores and other articles used or to be used in carrying on the post-office service.

The term "postal packet" means any article for the time being transmissible by post.

The term "parcel" means a postal packet which by the regulations of the Treasury made in pursuance of the post-office acts is defined to be a parcel, and the term "parcel mails" means mails (as hereinbefore defined) consisting of receptacles containing parcels only and of empty receptacles.

The term "mail ship" means a steamship provided for the performance of the weekly mail service to which this agreement relates.

The term "month" means a calendar month.

13. The company shall, during the term of this agreement, convey by means of mail ships from Liverpool (via Queenstown) or from Queenstown to New York, once in every week, on such day as hereinafter provided, all such mails as shall for the purpose of such conveyance be tendered or delivered at Liverpool and Queenstown, respectively, to the company, or any of their agents, officers, or servants, by the Postmaster-General or any of his officers or agents.

14. Each of the mail ships shall on every Saturday, as soon as possible after the advertised sailing hour and after the mails are embarked (or at such other time as the company, with the consent of the Postmaster-General, may fix), put to sea from Liverpool and proceed direct to Queenstown, and shall remain at Queenstown until the mails to be there embarked have been received on board, and shall thence and without unnecessary delay proceed direct to New York, and the company and their officers and servants shall use their best endeavors to complete the voyage of each such mail ship between the said places, respectively, within the shortest possible time consistent with prudent navigation.

15. (1) The mail ships shall be in all cases good, substantial, and efficient steam vessels, of adequate capacity, power, and speed, and shall be provided and kept by the company seaworthy and in complete repair and readiness to the satisfaction of the postmaster.

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing provision, and subject to the other provisions of this agreement, the company shall employ as mail ships the fastest of the steamships for the time being belonging to or chartered by the company.

(3) If any of the fastest of the company's steamships (a) shall be disabled for the conveyance of the mails, or (b) shall be hired by His Majesty's Government under the provisions of this agreement for some purpose other than the conveyance of mails, or (c) shall be temporarily withdrawn for the purpose of the usual annual overhauling requisite for the maintenance of efficiency, the company shall employ for the mail service the steamship or steamships ranking next in rate of speed among the available steamships for the time being belonging to or chartered by the company: Provided, That the company shall so arrange for the annual overhaul of their fastest steamships as to detract in the least possible degree from the rapidity of the mail service and its continuous and efficient performance.

16. The company shall at their own cost and to the satisfaction of the postmaster-general provide on each of the mail ships a separate room or rooms for the convenient and secure deposit and custody of the mails (other than parcel mails) under lock and key, and shall keep the parcel mails in a place of safety and take all reasonable precautions for their safe custody.

17. If the postmaster-general shall at any time desire that the mails be sorted on board the mail ships the following provisions shall apply; that is to say:

(1) The company shall provide on each of the mail ships, for the purpose of sorting and making up the mails, a separate and convenient room or rooms of such dimensions as the postmaster-general may from time to time reasonably require.

(2) Every such room shall be provided by the company with all such furniture, lamps, fittings, and other conveniences as shall be necessary or convenient for the purpose of sorting and making up the mails, and all such furniture, lamps, fittings, and other conveniences shall be from time to time cleansed and kept in repair, and the oil or other means of illumination for the lamps shall be supplied by and at the cost of the company.

(3) The services of the crew shall, subject to the directions of the master of the ship from time to time, be given in the conveyance of the mails between the mail room and the sorting room or rooms.

(4) The company shall also receive and allow to remain on board each of the mail ships on her voyage between Liverpool and New York, and also while stopping at Queenstown, and whether such mail ship shall be with or without mails on board, such number of officers of the British or United States post-office as shall be required for the purpose of sorting and making up the mails, and shall provide suitable accommodation and victualling for such officers, either as first-cabin passengers or as second-cabin passengers, at the option of the postmaster-general.

(5) In respect of the accommodation for sorting and making up the mails as aforesaid, and in respect of the accommodation and victualling of the said officers, the postmaster-general shall pay to the company, in addition to all sums payable for the conveyance of the mails under this agreement, such sum of money as may be agreed upon between him and them, or failing such agreement, as shall be determined by arbitration under clause 35 hereof, on the basis of a fair payment for the accommodation given.

18. The master or commander of each mail ship shall (unless otherwise requested by the postmaster-general) without any payment other than the sums payable to the company under this agreement, take charge of the mails; and every such master or commander shall make the usual oaths or declarations now or hereafter required by the postmaster-general in such and similar cases, and furnish to the postmaster-general abstracts of the log and such certificates showing the due delivery of the mails and such other information respecting the mails as the postmaster-general or his officers or agents may require; and every such master or commander shall himself, or by one of his officers, immediately on the arrival of the mail ship at New York deliver the mails into the hands of the proper officer of the United States post-office, or such other person as the postmaster-general shall authorize to receive the same.

19. The company shall not, nor shall the master or commander of any mail ship, without the consent of the postmaster-general, receive or permit to be received on board any mail ship any letters for conveyance from Liverpool or Queenstown other than those comprised in the mails conveyed under this agreement or such as are for the time being exempted by law from the exclusive privileges of the postmaster-general.

20. (1) The company shall, during the continuance of this agreement (in addition to conveying mails by the mail ships as herein provided), convey by any steamship of the company (except as hereinafter provided) performing any service undertaken by the company for their own purposes (a) all parcel mails from New York to Queenstown and Liverpool, and (b) all mails from the United Kingdom to the United States of America, which the postmaster-general or any of his officers or agents shall from time to time require to be conveyed: Provided, That, if in consequence of additions to its fleet, the company shall at any time establish a new fast weekly midweek service between Great Britain and the United States of America (that is to say, a service performed by vessels of a speed of 18 knots and upward per hour), and the postmaster-general shall, under the powers conferred by this clause, send by means of such new service a regular mail to the United States of America which shall be equal in weight, on an average of twelve months, to not less than 10 per cent of the average weight of the mail sent each week by a mail ship under this agreement, then the postmaster-general shall make such additional payment to the company for the advantage thus obtained as (regard being had to the other payments to the company under this agreement) may be agreed upon, or failing agreement, settled by arbitration under clause 35 hereof.

(2) All such mails as in this clause mentioned shall be delivered by the master or commander of the steamship at the ship's side to the proper officer or agent of the post-office at any port or place to which such steamship shall sail and for delivery at which such mails are tendered.

21. So long as the postmaster-general shall deem it expedient to maintain a special service by railway and mail packet from London to Queenstown on Saturday afternoons for the conveyance of mails to be embarked by the company at Queenstown, the company shall pay to the postmaster-general one-third of the cost of so much of the said special service as relates to the conveyance of mails between London and Dublin (Island Bridge), and the certificate of the comptroller and accountant-general of the post-office as to the cost of such service shall be accepted by the company as conclusive evidence of such cost.

22. The company shall undertake and make all necessary and proper arrangements in connection with any statutory regulations of the local government board relative to public health or in connection with quarantine which may be required in respect of the mail ships, and no deductions shall be made from the subsidy payable under this agreement, nor shall the company be otherwise liable for or by reason of any delay in the landing, embarkation, delivery, or conveyance of any mails arising from the observance of any such regulations or the imposition of quarantine.

23. The company shall not attempt to exercise any lien upon the mails for or in respect of a general average contribution.

24. (1) Nothing in this agreement shall exempt the company or any ship of the company from the operation of any act of Parliament, order in council, by-law, or other provision of the law in relation to explosives.

(2) The company shall not convey in any steamship conveying mails any article which in the opinion of the postmaster-general is likely to endanger the mails.

25. The company shall be responsible for the loss or damage of any parcel or of any registered postal packet of any kind conveyed or tendered for conveyance under this agreement (unless such loss or damage be caused or occasioned by act of God, the King's enemies, pirates, restraints of princes, rulers, or people, jettison, barratry, fire, collision, or peril or accidents of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation: provided, nevertheless, that the expression "barratry" shall not be deemed to include any unlawful act in respect of the mails on the part of the master or officer having charge thereof; and in the event of any such loss or damage (except as aforesaid) the company shall be liable to pay to the postmaster-general in respect of each parcel or registered postal packet so lost or damaged (subject to the proviso hereinafter contained) such sum of money as shall be equal to the amount which may have been awarded and paid by the postmaster-general at his sole option and discretion (and although not under any legal obligation) to the sender or addressee of such parcel or registered postal packet as compensation for the loss or damage thereof; provided that such sum shall not in any case exceed £1 per parcel or £2 per registered postal packet of any kind; provided, also, that the aggregate amount of the sums payable by the company under this clause shall not exceed the sum of £500 in respect of any one voyage.

26. In consideration of the covenants and agreements in this part of this agreement contained, and on the part of the company to be observed and performed, and of the due and faithful performance by the company of all the services in relation to mails provided for by this agreement, there shall be payable to the company during the term of this agreement (out of such aids or supplies as may from time to time be appropriated by Parliament for that purpose)—

(1) A yearly sum after the rate of £68,000 per annum, or (in the event of any such default or failure as hereinafter mentioned) so much of the said sum as shall remain payable in respect of any year after making such deductions therefrom (if any) as hereinafter in that behalf mentioned in respect of any such default or failure as hereinafter mentioned.

(2) Whenever in any one week more than 100 tons measurement (that is to say, 4,000 cubic feet) of parcel mails (exclusive of empty receptacles) in the aggregate are conveyed in either direction from Liverpool and Queenstown to New York or from New York to Queenstown and Liverpool (whether by the mail ships or by any other steamships of the company) a further sum of 26 shillings and 3 pence for every complete ton measurement (that is to say, 40 cubic feet) of parcel mails (exclusive of empty receptacles) conveyed in that direction in excess of 100 tons measurement; provided that in lieu of the further sum last hereinbefore mentioned the postmaster-general may at his option pay the rates of freight for the time being charged by the company on similar parcels to other companies or firms whose business it is to carry parcels; but all parcels for which the said rates of freight are paid by the postmaster-general shall be carried by the company subject to terms and conditions similar to those upon which the parcels of such other companies or firms are carried and not under the terms and conditions of this agreement.

27. And whereas the said annual payment of £68,000 to be made by His Majesty's Government has been fixed, having regard to the obligations and services to be undertaken and rendered by the company to His Majesty's Government under Part II of this agreement, now it is hereby agreed that if at any time during the continuance of the agreement—

(1) The company fail to provide at Liverpool one of the fastest of the steamships for the time being belonging to or chartered by the company and available for the conveyance of the mails in accordance with the provisions of this agreement ready to put to sea on and at the appointed day and hour; or

(2) If such steamship fails (a) to put to sea on and at the appointed day and hour or immediately after the mails are embarked, or (b) to proceed direct to Queenstown, or (c) to remain at Queenstown until the mails to be there embarked have been received on board, or (d) immediately upon the receipt of such mails to proceed direct to New York; or

(3) If the company makes default in the performance of any other of the services undertaken to be rendered by the company under Part II of this agreement—

Then and so often as any such default shall happen (unless such default arose wholly or in part from any cause or causes beyond the control of the company) there shall be deducted from the annual payment which would in the absence of any such default be payable to the company such a sum as shall be agreed upon between the postmaster-general and the company, or, failing such agreement, be fixed by arbitration under clause 35 hereof, as representing the proportionate value of the service in which default has been made, having regard to the aggregate services covenanted to be performed by the company and the total sum payable under this part of this agreement.

28. (1) The said yearly sum of £68,000 shall be payable by monthly installments, and all accounts in relation to the payments to be made by the postmaster-general to the company as hereinbefore provided, and any deductions therefrom as hereinbefore provided, shall be made out and settled monthly up to and on or as soon as conveniently may be after the end of each month, and the amount (if any) which shall be due to the company on each such monthly account shall be paid by the postmaster-general at the general post-office in London out of such aids or supplies as aforesaid upon the settlement of each such account.

(2) All such several payments as aforesaid shall be received by the company in full satisfaction and discharge of all claims and demands by them for or on account of the services hereby contracted to be performed in relation to the conveyance of mails or any damages, losses, or expenses which may be sustained by the company in respect thereof.

(3) For the purpose of the accounts and payments referred to in this clause the said yearly subsidy of £68,000 shall be deemed to accrue from day to day, subject to the liability of the same to be altered by such deductions as aforesaid.

29. If on the determination of this agreement any mail ship or other steamship shall have started with the mails on board in conformity with this agreement, but shall not have delivered such mails, such voyage or voyages shall be continued and performed and such mails shall be conveyed and delivered in all respects as if this agreement had remained in force with regard to such ship and services, and in such case this agreement shall accordingly be deemed to terminate upon the due delivery of the said mails.

30. The company shall not assign, underlet, or dispose of the benefit of this part of this agreement or of any of the provisions thereof without the consent of the postmaster-general signified by an instrument in writing.

31. In case of any great or habitual breach of this part of this agreement, or of any covenant, matter, or thing therein contained, on the part of the company, its officers, agents, or servants, the postmaster-general may, if he shall think fit, but notwithstanding there may or may not have been any former breach of this part of this agreement, by an instrument in writing determine this part of this agreement, and the company shall not be entitled to any compensation in respect of such determination, and such determination shall not deprive the postmaster-general of any right or remedy to which he would otherwise be entitled by reason of such breach or any prior breach of this part of this agreement.

32. (1) Any notice to determine this part of this agreement shall be served by being delivered at or transmitted by post to the company at its principal office for the time being.

(2) All other notices and all directions or requisitions which the postmaster-general or his officers or agents are hereby authorized to give to the company, its officers, servants, or agents, may at the option of the postmaster-general, his officers or agents, either be delivered to the master or commander of any steamship or other officer or agent in charge or management of any steamship or left for or forwarded by post to the company at any office of the company, and any notices, directions, or requisitions so given or left shall be binding on the company.

33. As from the date when this agreement comes into force the said agreement dated the 31st day of July, 1899, in relation to the carriage of mails shall be deemed to be determined.

PART III.—Term of agreement and incidental provisions.

34. This agreement shall come into force on the date hereof, and shall remain in force until the expiration of twenty years as from the date upon which the second of the two steamships referred to in clause 3 hereof shall sail on such first voyage as is described in clause 6 hereof, and the period during which this agreement is in force is in this agreement referred to as the "term of this agreement."

35. In the event of any difference or dispute arising between His Majesty's Government or the admiralty or the board of trade or the postmaster-general on the one hand and the company on the other hand regarding this agreement, or any matter or thing therein contained or relating thereto, every such matter in difference or dispute except as herein otherwise provided shall be settled and determined in manner provided by the arbitration act 1889 or any acts amending the same.

36. In pursuance of the provisions contained in the House of Commons (disqualification) act 1782 no member of the House of Commons shall be admitted to any share or part of this agreement or to any benefit to arise therefrom contrary to the true intent and meaning of the said act.

37. Having regard to the standing orders of the House of Commons this agreement shall not be binding until it has been approved by a resolution of the House of Commons.

38. So soon as the special resolution referred to in clause 2 hereof and the second schedule hereto shall have been confirmed, the directors of the company shall forthwith proceed to execute and do all such instruments, acts, and things as may be necessary or proper for giving full effect to this agreement, and in particular, if necessary or proper or if required so to do by His Majesty's Government, they will cause the seal of the company to be reaffixed hereto or to be affixed to a supplementary document confirming this agreement.

39. The schedules to this agreement shall be deemed to be part of this agreement in all respects as if the same had been incorporated therein.

40. The marginal notes hereto shall not affect the construction hereof.

In witness whereof two of the commissioners for executing the office of lord high admiral of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the postmaster-general have hereunto set their hands and seals, the board of trade have hereunto caused their seal to be affixed, and the company has hereunto caused its common seal to be affixed, the day and year first before written.

Prosperous British shipyards.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR, BUREAU OF NAVIGATION,
Washington, February 16, 1906.

Hon. C. H. GROSVENOR,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR GENERAL: I inclose herewith a copy of H. E. Moss & Co.'s steamship circular for February 6, 1906. This firm is one of the largest engaged in selling and chartering ships in the world, and their statements always attract considerable attention. I desire to call your attention to the passage in which they refer to the increase in the cost of building ships in England within the past few months, say from 15 per cent to 20 per cent. The statement illustrates the difficulty in making precise comparisons between the relative cost of building here and abroad.

Sincerely, yours,

E. T. CHAMBERLAIN,
Commissioner.

[H. E. Moss & Co.'s steamship circular.]

LIVERPOOL, February 6, 1906.

Since the issue of our last semiannual steamship circular, the year just closed has become memorable in history by the termination of the greatest war that ever was fought, the greatest naval engagement since Trafalgar, and the greatest number of orders placed for new steamers, mostly contracted for in August and September, on the eve of the termination of the Russo-Japanese war, when prices were about at their lowest, and within the space of six weeks most of the builders were filled up with work, many until 1907.

We have to record that in 1905 there were launched from British yards 823 vessels, including war ships, amounting to about 1,752,960 tons, or 1,623,168 tons of merchant shipping, being 418,000 tons more than in 1904 and 100,000 tons more than the previous highest record of 1901. The output from foreign shipbuilding yards was equally as large in proportion.

We do not say that freights warranted so many orders being placed, but the low prices quoted and the prospects of better business carried most people along, the result being that the amount of steam tonnage under construction in this country on the 31st December, 1905, was 487 steamers, of about 1,355,756 tons, compared with 371 steamers, of about 1,049,756 tons, on 31st December, 1904.

With all this work on order it is only natural that prices for building should have advanced rapidly—we may say fully 15 to 20 per cent—and for tramp steamers of 6,000 or 7,000 tons dead weight from £5 10s. to about £6 15s. per ton dead weight, according to size and specification.

For instance, steamers of 6,000 tons, costing some months ago £35,000 to £36,000, could not be contracted for to-day at less than £40,000 to £41,000.

Most of the tramp steamers ordered were from 6,000 to 7,000 tons, whereas in previous years they were from 4,000 to 5,000 tons dead weight.

Unfortunately freights have not advanced proportionately, and as a result steamers contracted for at the bottom of the market are being offered for sale at prices below what they can be presently built for, and many owners have been able to sell their vessels at very handsome profits, with the result that very few new orders for tramp steamers have recently been given out.

Prices of second-hand steamers have advanced considerably, though not in the same proportion as for new steamers.

With the large amount of tonnage building, most owners are naturally anxious as to the future prospects, and some predict a speedy reaction; but seeing there are few steamers presently unemployed, although the Baltic is closed and most Russian trades dislocated on account of the terribly disturbed condition of that country; also that our board of trade returns for 1905 show an increase in exports over 1904 of nearly £30,000,000, and in imports of over £14,000,000, being £44,000,000 in a total of £880,000,000; that the trade of this and all other countries is rapidly improving; that the expansion in the Pacific is still in its infancy; while we can not think that there will be any very great improvement in freights in 1906, we believe we will see much better times in 1907, and although it is difficult to foretell the immediate future we are not pessimistic in our views and look for a gradual improvement. In any case it will be some considerable time before prices can again reach the low level of last year.

We are, gentlemen, yours, respectfully,

H. E. MOSS & Co.

THE SHIPPING BILL OF THE MERCHANT MARINE COMMISSION. (S. 529.)

An act to promote the national defense, to create a naval reserve, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, and to promote commerce.

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be enrolled, in such manner and under such requirements as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, from the officers and men now and hereafter employed in the merchant marine and fisheries of the United States, including the coastwise trade of the Atlantic and Pacific and the Great Lakes, such officers, petty officers, and men as may be capable of rendering service as members of a naval reserve, for duty in time of war, and who are willing to undertake such service, to be classified in grades and ratings according to their capacity as shown at time of enrollment. No man shall be thus enrolled who is not a citizen of the United States, either by birth or naturalization. These members of the Naval Reserve shall be enrolled for a period of four years, during which period they shall be subject to render service on call of the President in time of war. They shall also possess such qualifications, receive such instruction, and be subject to such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, upon proper audit by the Auditor for the Navy Department, to pay, out of any money to be annually appropriated therefor upon estimates to be annually submitted to Congress in the Book of Estimates, to each officer, petty officer, or man thus enrolled and employed in the merchant marine or fisheries, including the coastwise trade of the Atlantic and Pacific and the Great Lakes as hereinafter provided, an annual retainer, as follows: For each officer of the line or Engineer Corps, having the rank of lieutenant of the Naval Reserve, $110; for each officer of the line or Engineer Corps, having the rank of lieutenant (junior grade) in the Naval Reserve, $90; for each officer of the line or Engineer Corps, having the rank of ensign in the Naval Reserve, $80; for each man with a rating of chief petty officer, $70; for each man with a rating of petty officer, first class, $60; for each man with a rating of petty officer, second class, $48; for each man with a rating of petty officer, third class, $40; for each seaman, first class, $36; for each seaman, second class, $30; for each seaman, third class, $24. Such retainer shall be paid at the end of each year of service on certificate, by the Secretary of the Navy, that the member of the Naval Reserve has satisfactorily complied with the regulations, and on certificate by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that such member has served satisfactorily for at least six months of the preceding twelve months on vessels of the United States in the merchant marine or in the deep-sea fisheries. The total number of officers, petty officers, and men enrolled in the Naval Reserve shall not at any time exceed 10,000.
